FRANK LOUIS SOLDAN

BEN BLEWETT

WILLIAM J. S. BRYAN

JOHN RUSH POWELL

Dedication

To the four educational administrators whose vision, wisdom, and leadership have been linked indissolubly with the establishment and development of the Frank Louis Soldan High School, this issue, commemorative of the twentieth anniversary of the founding of the school, is dedicated by the editorial board of the Soldan Scrip:

FRANK LOUIS SOLDAN

Superintendent, St. Louis Public Schools, 1895 - 1908

BEN BLEWETT

WILLIAM J. S. BRYAN

Assistant Superintendent, Public High Schools, 1908 -

JOHN RUSH POWELL

Principal of the Frank Louis Soldan High School, 1909 -

The Soldan Memorial

ONE of the most impressive auditorium sessions of the year was the memorial exercise on the anniversary of the birth of Dr. Soldan, October 20. At one o'clock the school assembled in the auditorium. Mr. Powell escorted the guests to the stage, Superintendent of Education, Mr. Blewett, Assistant Superintendents Mr. Bryan and Mr. Collins, and the President of the Board of Education, Mr. Garneau.

After an explanation of the meaning of the day, Mr. Powell introduced Mr. Blewett, who spoke appreciatively and sympathetically on the life and character of Dr. Soldan. After a song by a quartet of Soldan boys, Mr. Bryan spoke for a few minutes on personal reminiscences of work with Dr. Soldan.

It had been known for some time prior to this day that a portrait of Dr. Soldan, painted by Mr. Kissack of the Soldan faculty, had been presented by him to the Board of Education. No more appropriate place could be found for the portrait than the walls of the Soldan High School, and no more appropriate time for its presentation than on this memorial day.

Accordingly, in a few impressive words, Mr. Garneau in behalf of the Board of Education, presented to the Soldan High School the Kissack portrait of Dr. Soldan, which simultaneously was unveiled amid the prolonged cheers of a thousand pupils and teachers, friends of Dr. Soldan. Mr. Powell received the portrait for the school, and in a few remarks commented upon the beautiful appropriateness of such a memorial, and expressed the gratitude of the school to Mr. Kissack, to whose generosity and loyalty we are indebted.

The singing of Wagner's Pilgrim's Chorus by the entire school completed the impressive program.

The Brown and Gold

ONE of the most important events of the beginning of the school year was the selection of the school colors. Towards the latter part of September, Mr. Powell announced in an auditorium session that the time had come for the school to select its colors. Accordingly Mr. Powell appointed a committee composed of members of the faculty and the school. The faculty was represented by Mr. Powell, ex-officio; Mr. Douglass, chairman; Miss Brown, Miss Mason, Miss Finkelnburg and Mr. Kissack; and the students by the following boys and girls selected from the various terms in the school: Lucille Stevens, Marion Griffith, Marjorie Volkening, Margaret De Garmo, Virginia Baker, Julia Groves, Lucille Straus, Helen Shryock, Helen Ittner, William McCandless, Kercheval Ray, Andrew Baker, Charles Kroehle, Silas Lincoln, Ben Cunliff, Donald O'Neil, Clark Browne and William Wurdack. The committee selected twelve different combinations at their meeting, and displayed the colors on the auditorium stage the following week. Naturally the excitement was intense, and when the ballots were passed the excitement broke loose in murmurs and calls for the "favorite color". Two days later announcement was made by Mr. Douglass there was to be a second vote confined to the four colors that had received the highest votes. These colors were brown and gold, maroon and gray, blue and tan, and green and gold. The second vote was not decisive, and another was taken, with brown and gold, and maroon and gray, as the favorite colors. Mr. Douglass, in a few words, told the assemblage not to be hasty about this matter of voting, but to be cautious and deliberate. He also explained how a suit trimmed in brown and gold, and one in maroon and gray would look on our boys. After auditorium session excitement ran high, and groups of pupils could be seen here and there consulting with regard to the outcome of the election. At twelve o'clock the victorious colors, brown and gold, were hung up opposite the entrance, while those whose color had won, and those whose color had lost, passed up and down the hall, paying homage to the Soldan colors. October 5th, the day of the Educational Parade, was the day of the first "showing off"; and the public showed by their applause their appreciation of the choice of colors by our school.

Frank Louis Soldan

By Superintendent Ben Blewett

THE tablet to be placed in the portal to this building, devoted to public education, will bear the following inscription:

"In recognition of the distinguished services rendered to the cause of education and in testimony of their esteem for a life that subordinated personal comfort and gain to a lofty conception of the duty of a public official, to impress upon the youth of the city the supreme value of civic virtue, the Board of Education of the City of St. Louis has named this the Frank Louis Soldan High School, and his associates and friends have erected this tablet."

This is not an empty tribute of adulation paid under the stress of an excitement caused by the tragic death of a public official. It is the deliberate expression of an admiration and love that are the growth of years of intimate acquaintance with the purposes and acts of a life lived in this city from youth to mature manhood.

Superintendent Soldan was born in Germany in 1842, came to St. Louis in 1863, and became a teacher of modern languages in the High School in 1868. All the years from 1868 to his death in 1908 were spent in the service of the public schools of this city.

He held successively the positions of teacher, assistant superintendent, principal of the Normal School, principal of the High School, and of superintendent. In all of these positions his success was conspicuous, and in all of them it was marked by the same characteristics of a strong man. While no man could be more sensitive than he was to the approval of the public, he did not shape his work to win praise, but to accomplish important ends. He rejoiced in the consciousness of good accomplished, and modestly accepted whatever praise might follow years of unwavering pursuit of his plans for the advancement of the work of the schools. In the assemblies of men he was a recognized power, yet his great influence there came largely from his unselfish recognition of the feelings and rights of others.

His devotion to his work as a public officer was complete. No necessary effort was too great for him to undertake, and no detail of business was too small to engage his attention and care when they were needed.

He was scrupulous in these matters and spared himself no pains in the conduct of his office that he would not have spared himself in the management of his private affairs. No offer of opportunity for advancement of his personal interests attracted his consideration when there could be in it any possibility of detracting from the service he might render to the cause of education.

His modesty and his devotion to his work had their sources in the same element of his character.

No one approached this man with right purpose who did not feel the warmth of his genial sympathy. It was this natural impulse to put himself in the other man's place which made him modest and made him honest.

His sympathy with the individual was an influence that sweetened and strengthened the lives of hundreds.

Manifesting itself as altruism, this sympathy pervaded and gave character to the great institution over which he presided. His co-workers, catching the inspiration from their leader, united in the common cause of brightening and uplifting the world in which they worked.

I have heard him say that his greatest ambition was to be held in the memory of the youth of this city as their helper.

The building in which this school is housed bears the name of the great superintendent as a memorial of his intellect and his moral character.

May the virtues so prominent in his public life make such an impression upon this school, the pupils that enter and go out from these halls, that their lives may erect for their departed friend a monument more enduring than the bronze that records the dedication of this house.

Founder's Day

Introductory Remarks by Principal John Rush Powell, October 20, 1909

IN the opening morning of this school year, I alluded to the appropriateness and significance of the name our High bears. I remember suggesting to you on that occasion that it would be eminently proper for us as a school to set apart some day for honoring appropriately the memory of Dr. Frank Louis Soldan. And so, young ladies and gentlemen of the Soldan High School, I have invited you here today to participate in these simple exercises, held in honor of a great man, whose professional activity and personal influence are indissolubly connected with the inception, indeed the founding of this institution. The day upon which we have chosen to commemorate his name and character, is the anniversary of his birth. I therefore propose to you that we call this day "Founder's Day", to be observed by you and by those who come after you as an annual school event.

It is not inappropriate to speak of Dr. Soldan as the founder of this school. Long before the site was purchased and the plans of the building were begun, this school, in its approximate location and with its approximate appointments, existed as an ideal in the mind of Dr. Soldan. He lived to see the plans of the building completed and the foundations of the structure laid. Even the question of finding a suitable name, great enough for this great school, was under his consideration only a few weeks before his death.

The facts connected with the naming of this school are familiar to you. On the occasion of the funeral services held in honor of Dr. Soldan, a member of the Board of Education said: "It will be the duty of the Board of Education to see to it that as his work so his name shall not be forgotten." Two weeks later, by unanimous vote, the Board of Education named the new school then being erected on this spot "The Frank Louis Soldan High School". And so today we are members of an institution founded as a lasting monument to his memory.

May the exercises commemorating his service to this city and to the cause of education in general, awaken anew our ambitions and quicken our sense of obligation to those whose life and thought have entered into the founding of our school; may this day and its annual recurrence be an inspiration to all of us, and may it serve to increase our loyalty to the ideals for which we stand; may the great words we have chosen to represent those ideals, "Truth, Honor, Freedom, Courtesy", never mean less than they do today, as we contemplate the character and virtues of him whom we honor as the Founder of the Frank Louis Soldan High School.

The Soldan Faculty, 1909-1929

S is the Faculty, so is the School. The personnel of the student body changes rapidly, with a new group of four or five hundred pupils entering each semester. Theoretically, the entire student body changes every four or five years.

The change is so complete that the school would be an entirely new school were it not for the Faculty and the subtle permanence of pupil tradition which is fostered by the Faculty. Twenty years is a short time for the making of tradition, but at Soldan there are already many interesting and valuable traditions, and above all there is the sure and steady growth of school spirit and loyalty, making for the solidarity which is strengthened with the years. For this wholesome and loyal school spirit, the School is more indebted than it knows to the influence of the Faculty.

The Faculty has primary responsibility in matters pertaining to the curriculum and in maintaining the standard for promotion and graduation. The class-room is the teacher's undisputed ground of direction, leadership, and authority; it is here that boys and girls come into that relationship of teacher and pupil which is the real center and core of the school, without which all else would be superficial and meaningless. But the teacher is far more than merely a class-room teacher of subjects. As Adviser, the teacher has both opportunity and responsibility second only to the teaching of pupils in the curriculum schedule of subjects. Many pupils come under the influence of their Adviser who, as teacher, never has the opportunity of teaching them in their respective classes.

The voluntary sponsorship of athletics and other student activities is one of the most beautiful of school relationships,—one which pupils too often take for granted without really appreciating the hours of sacrifice and the painstaking work involved in such leadership. The teachers enjoy their sponsorships, to be sure, for such activities are interesting and wholesome, and it is in these voluntary clubs and activities that we find the pupils most co-operative. Soldan's club life has been an important factor in the molding of our excellent and wholesome school spirit, characteristic of the School since its very beginning. In this unassigned and voluntary relationship of sponsor, director, or coach, the teacher contributes an immeasurable influence in the molding of school spirit. It is impossible here to make adequate acknowledgment to our teachers for their guidance and helpfulness, but it is appropriate that it should be recorded among the inestimable influences of the past and present.

The list of "Charter Members" of the Soldan Faculty has been growing smaller year by year. Many have been promoted to higher fields of activity in our own school system; many have found their opportunity of further advancement in other school systems; many have been transferred to other schools in our system because of program changes growing out of the constantly expanding curriculum; some have married, thereby severing their connection with the School but continuing to live in this city or elsewhere; and some have joined the mysterious caravan journeying to the undiscovered country whose portal we call Death. To the "Charter Members" who are still with us in their accustomed places,—thirteen in number,—the School owes much in the making and maintaining of those standards which are the very essence of the School's reputation and worth. Of the original number of sixty-three "Charter Members" of the Soldan Faculty of 1909-1910, the following teachers of Soldan are carrying on, and the hope is here expressed that the School may continue to have the benefit of their constructive thought and work for years to come:

In reviewing the Faculty lists of twenty years, the following summary contains the names of all teachers, 264 in number, regularly assigned to this School, arranged for convenient reference by departments. The date given at the extreme right hand of the page is the date of first affiliation with the School. The list of present members of the Faculty, 1928-1929, is found in line at the extreme left hand of the page; the list of former members is indented toward the center; deceased members are indicated by an asterisk*; where possible to ascertain the information, the present addresses of all former members are given, together with the new name if the teacher is married.

OVERTURE,—"Marche Slave".....Tschaikowsky
Soldan Orchestra

PROLOGUE, attended by Heralds and Pages

PROLOGUE

O Muses, lend your clearest, purest tones
To sing great Soldan's praise! And give the sky
For sounding-board, the sun for glowing fire,
The stars to crown our Alma Mater's brow!
Unroll Time's hallowed scroll, O Fates, and spread
To view the glorious past that Soldan owns!
The mists of twenty years are cleared away;
And lo! the flaming letters of our Motto show:
"Trouthe and Honour, Freedom and Curteisye".
The rainbow trails across the earth, and leaves
Two mystic colors in its wake; a third,
Grim scarlet, trickles close beside, to bind
The two with broken heart-strings. The glow of Health
And Wisdom's sweetest charms from Plenty's horn
Are poured. And then behold a vaster throng
That kneels at Alma Mater's feet, exults
In her, and pours out gifts of richest store.
O Skies, send back her praise ten-thousandfold,—
And still 'tis not enough! O strain, ye steeds
That guide the sun! Outpace your course! Leap o'er
The gates of Night, and strive for yonder farthest
Star to lay at Soldan's feet! The heart
Of brightest blaze beams not more bright than this Rich record of unselfish service given!

(Betty Reel)

INVOCATION

O all ye powers of thought and work and song,
And all ye kindred lords of light and joy,
We pour libations at your altars high
And raise our voices, pleading for your gifts
Of Poesy's exalted trumpet-tones:
For here we have a theme most glorious,
Most worthy of triumphant blazonry—
Our Alma Mater's treasured history.

And you whose eager hearts have led you here,
To share the honor of her bounteous praise,
To stir the embers of undying fires,
And warm your lives with tender, glowing zeal,
Pour forth the treasures of your memory
To swell the volume and intensity
Of this, our Alma Mater's history!

On waves of ether through the willing air
In silent wave-lengths of uncharted thought,
Come crowding, messages from far away
Voiceless but eloquent of unseen presences
Whose lives bear evidence in worth or force
Of thoughts and deeds and silent influence
That time has mingled with the panoply
Of this, our Alma Mater's history. (Phoebe Hesper)

AUTUMN LEAVES,—A Study in Brown and Gold

The breath of Autumn browns the falling leaves;
They gyrate, drop, and float upon the breeze,
And dance to music whistled by the wind,
Then whirl, and pause, until they strike the earth.
And from the earth there rise in blazing growth
The golden maples backed by soft'ning brown.
The touch of Autumn yellows them to gold.
This painted gown, dear Nature's autumn cloak,
We look upon, and see the gold and brown.
These colors Soldan takes as hers with pride.
(Abe Treiman)

THE COLORS

At last arrived the jousting day
When Color Knights in bright array
Before the lords and ladies fair
Struggled to find the fittest pair.
At trumpet's call the couples came
Expecting death or deathless fame—
Care-free and gay rode Gold and Green
With shining helms and lances keen.
Next in line came Tan and Blue,
Their swords were bright, their aim was true.
Maroon and Silver, tall and proud,
Won lords' applause both long and loud.
But ladies smiled on heroes bold
As prancing steeds brought Brown and Gold.
The jousts charged with fearful din,
Each fighting hard, heart set to win.
Green and Gold were vanquished first,
With broken lances and helmets burst,
Blue and Tan next met their death;
Their blood ebbed fast with dying breath.
Now came a long and bloody fray
Between Brown-and-Gold and Maroon-and-Gray.
And over the hills the echoes rolled,
Proclaiming the victory of Brown and Gold.
In ending this tale of a battle won,
The story told is just begun.
For ever since this glorious knight
Has kept his name and colors bright,
Battling for Freedom and Chivalry
With Truth and Honor and Courtesy.

SCHOLASTIC ACHIEVEMENT

Latin Hymn (Words and Music by Thomas Steele Hall)
Soldan Glee Club

Processional of "The Torchbearers"

HYMNUS: FESSI, VENITE

Fessi, venite ad Deum,	Ye weary come unto the Lord,
Et iam veneremur Eum.	And now let us all worship Him,
Animas vestras levabit,	For now your souls will He relieve,
Omnes dolores iuvabit.	For He will comfort your souls.
Extollamus voces nostras	Our voices let us raise on high,
Laudas canite his locis,	Now praises in these places sing,
Et huc gratiis venite	And with thanksgiving come ye here
Vocem pastoris audite.	Unto the Shepherd's voice now hark.
Qui fecit caelum terramque	Who made the heavens and the earth
Qui dedit mare vitamque,	Who gave the sea and also life,
Libenter Eum laudemus,	That One now let us gladly praise,
Eum pie supplicemus.	Devoutly let us worship Him.

(Thomas Steele Hall)

SCHOLARSHIP

Sweet Scholarship is like a clear pure flame,
Fanned into being from the Mind, divine,
Fed and nourished with rich Wisdom's oil,
Illuminating worlds of Thought with light.
She is an intellectual Sun that warms
All men with her bright rays. And Scholarship,
Set in a plodding world, is like a pearl
Among the pebbles, a dewdrop in the grass.
Her symbol is a flaming torch passed on
From hand to hand, tended and cherished by
Each one who, priv'leged, bears it but a step.
Its welfare is their common care. They tend
It with the zeal that true devotion brings.

MEMORIES OF THE SHAKESPEARE TERCENTENARY

Excerpt from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"
Soldan Dramatic Guild

FAIRY REVELS

The fairies are chanting softly
To the elves, up in the trees;
Zephyrs are wafting fairy music
Out upon the still night breeze;
Spider webs are hanging silken
In the flood of pale moonlight,
While the dew drops on them glitter,
Glistening star-like in the night.

Come and listen while they play;
Hear the fairy voices gay;
Harken to the blue-bells chiming
As they greet the coming day.
See! The crescent lamp of Heaven
Is turning paler in the sky,
For the mist is in the valley,
And the dawn is drawing nigh.

See! The stars have hid their faces,
Bowed their heads and turned away.
"Do you fear, you worlds above us,
Do you fear the coming day?"
'Tis good for mortals as for fairies
Thus to sing and dance and play,
As the evening brings the dawning,
And the dawning brings the day!

THE WAR

The War! A million hearts grew cold with fear;
A million voices rose in silent prayer;
Our Country's call we answered in accord
With those ideals which our proud banners bear,—
"Trouthe and Honour, Freedom and Curteisye".
The call was answered; all we had to give
We gave,—our boys, on foreign battlefields,
Fought side by side that such ideals might live.

(May Holmes)

War that drains the blood of lusty youth
Had once too often drunk his gory draught.
Uneasy nations, chafing 'neath his clutch,
Essayed to thrust him boldly from his throne.
Peace donned War's ugly gear to strive with War;
She set her tramping feet against War's march,
Her armored columns 'gainst his thundering guns.
The khaki hid her white and spotless robes;
The bayonet replaced the olive branch.
O' Mystic Peace! How dear are those that stained Thy Altars red with blood that Peace might come!
They have not died in vain! Their life-stream feeds,
Like holy oil, the high-held Lamp of Peace!

(Betty Reel)

Ye youths who sleep 'neath foreign skies,
The spring has come to us again!
Poppies in gracious beauty rise,
As hope within the souls of men.

Your spirit lives forever on;
Winds whisper softly o'er your mounds;
Your fame is writ in golden stars,
And through Eternity resounds.

(Geraldine Fennell Eliot)

SENIOR STUNTS

Dances and Stunts by Seniors of June, 1929

IN PRAISE OF YOUTH

Time immemorial has glorified
The grace and beauty, joys and hope of youth.
Paeans have sounded forth in loud acclaim
Of rarest pleasure found alone in youth.
But those who have thus tried to honor youth,
Through finished art of sculpture, music, verse,
Seem not to know that youth to youth doth turn
To understand and glorify itself.
Within these well-loved walls, twice every year,
Since first the walls were built, the youth have tried
To celebrate their care-free joys in ways
That they alone can use. And so has grown
Our "Stunt Day", when we've dressed in costumes gay,
Dazzling, glorious, graceful. Laughter reigned
As Fiction with staid History awry
In rich confusion spilled our heroes forth;
For here, might Caesar dance with Little Nell,
While D'Artagnan to Cleopatra talked,
And here they whirled to music fast and free.
To thee, then, Soldan, give we thanks and praise
For these gay memories thou gavest us,
Of how we glorified in youth that day
Of fun and frolic we have called "Stunt Day"!
(Esther Priwer)

GYMNASTIC TEAM IN FEATS OF SKILL

Stunts Exemplifying Physical Control and Team Work, the Basis of All Athletics

Far off we hear the clamoring shouts of men,
Proclaiming loud achievements of their sons
In strength and skill, as, in Olympian Games
The Greeks would cheer their heroes on to fame.
So, Soldan boys, in modern games of strength,
Outstrip their rivals often in the race,
And then receive the honors with acclaim.
Of fellow students' joyous cheers and shouts.
(Samuel Schwartzberg)

THE MUSIC CLUBS IN OPERA

The Orchestra, Glee Club, and Chaminade Club
in an excerpt from "THE MIKADO"

All hail to the Mikado! Thrice hath he,
With dainty toddling maidens sweetly shy,
Who sugared o'er their saucy impudence
To Yum-Yum and her lover, Nanki-Poo,
With sweetest melody that softly sank
Into our eager hearts, been welcomed here.
In gaudy robes, with fluttering fans, they came
In proud display, these youths of old Japan.

(Dorothy Compton)

As numerous as the high Olympian gods,
So are the labors of ingenious man.
But the varied children of man's mind
Are not, as was Minerva, born full-armed.
Before the sword-hilt or the shield appear,
Must man behold it in the empty air;
And then, to make the vision realized,
Must he imbibe, without restraint or stay
His own ambrosia, erudition's draught.
But this ambrosia has to every man
A different flavor, each to suit his taste.
Who longs from mighty Pan to learn, or from Sweet Orpheus with his mystic flute,
May find his drink doth offer music sweet;
While he who envies Hercules his strength
May find that strength within the magic cup.
Arise, O Muse, and teach me by thy art
How I may picture with immortal brush,
And image all the beauties of the earth!
In anxious tones thus cries the mortal, weak,
And lo! the Muse extends the self-same cup!

(Esther Priwer)

TROPHIES OF VICTORY

"March, March on Down the Field"
"Our Director"
"The Brown and Gold"
"Cheer, Cheer for Soldan"

THE FRUITS OF TWENTY YEARS,—Our Graduates

“Their Banners Still Inspire Us”

THE ALUMNI

What means this throng that comes and bows the knee
Before our Alma Mater's throne? Why sing
They thus melodious chants of praise and joy?
They are the noble progeny, the sons
And daughters of a mighty queen of schools,
Our Soldan. Forth to life's embattled charge
Of hapless fate, or triumph, have they gone.
Life beckoned to them with a gilded hand
And pointed to the untried paths ahead
With promise of great opportunity.
Though eager, with reluctance, wavered they
'Twixt backward glance to fleeting joys, to catch
The glimpse of things to be. Life's current now
Has borne them on to new achievements, hopes,
And aims. The joy of life, the urge is theirs,
But still the chords of memory vibrate
And draw them back to old familiar halls
To honor Alma Mater with their praise.

(Betty Reel)

ENSEMBLE,—“SOLDAN, ALMA MATER”

“Conquer, Soldan, conquer,”
Faithful voices shout,
“Sweep aside resistance,
Put the foe to rout.”
Loyal hearts inspiring,
Soldan cannot fail;
'Gainst our valiant spirit,
None can e'er prevail.

Chorus

Soldan, cheer for Soldan,
Alma Mater, loud and clear;
Strong and steady,
Every ready
In the fight for victory.
Soldan, cheer for Soldan,
For we're sure to win renown;
So we'll raise our voice to Soldan,
For the Pride of the Gold and Brown.

Conquer, Soldan, conquer,
Triumph over all,
As the sons of Soldan
Hasten to your call;
Naught can stay our progress,
Onward moves the throng;
Pledge we faith to Soldan,
Both in deed and song.

Chorus

Soldan, here's to Soldan,
May her name be always bright;
Conquer ever,
Falter never,
In her struggle for the right.
Soldan, dreams of Soldan,
When we've drifted far apart,
And in life as in our school days
Hold her motto in our heart.

The Shakespearean Pageant

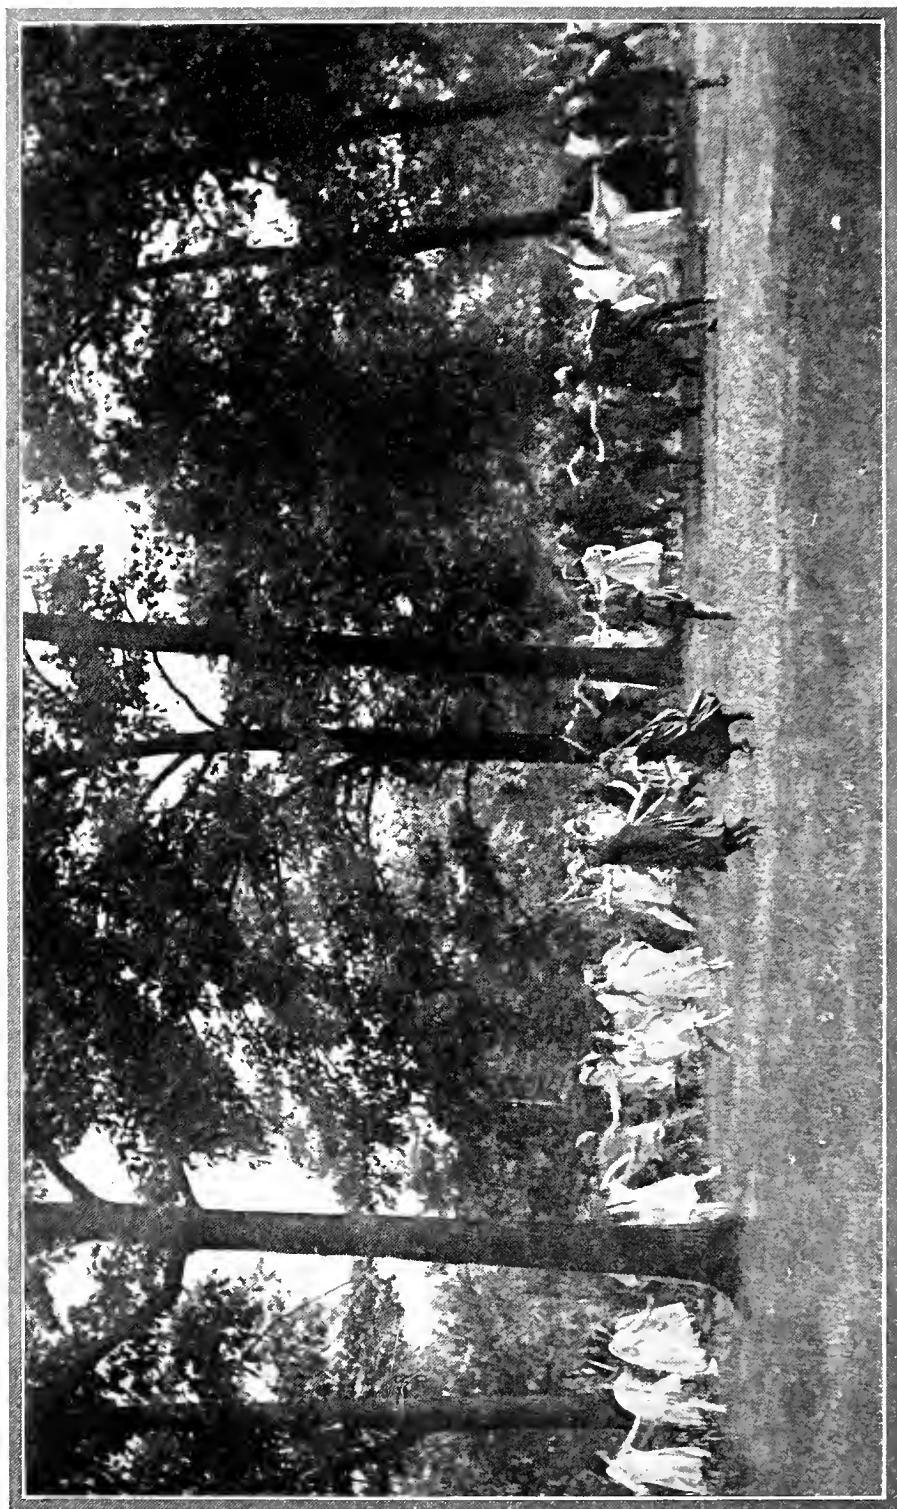

IN Shakespeare's day, bands of strolling players wandered about the country giving performances wherever they could find a convenient inn yard. The audience came and went as it pleased, eddying in and out of the little courtyard, staying five minutes or an hour—a most delightful and informal sort of entertainment. There were no stage settings or "props". A small placard hung at the side announced the scene, and the audience was expected to use its imagination. On very special occasions, exceedingly beautiful pageants were produced by these players, who celebrated therein the coronation of a king, or the birthday of a saint, or some other important event.

This old practice was revived by Soldan students in nineteen hundred sixteen, when the entire school turned itself into an Elizabethan audience and several groups of players, in order to celebrate with fitting pomp and honor the three hundredth anniversary of Shakespeare's death. It was one of the most pretentious enterprises that the school ever undertook.

Who can fail to remember the gay scene, as the entire school, in the most colorful of costumes, crossed Union avenue in a body and walked to Forest Park beyond the present Municipal Theatre along Bird Cage Walk to the scene of the pageant?

This began with the assembling of the Elizabethan audience, which added a good deal of color to the scene. The pastimes of Shakespeare's day, the quarter-staff exhibition, seventeenth century football, tumbling—all kinds of games combined to make a very interesting prelude. At the close of these events, Master William Shakespeare and Queen Elizabeth, accompanied by Her Majesty's court, arrived to view the festivities. After their arrival and just before the presentation of "As You Like It", there moved across the stage a pageant composed of the major characters in fourteen of Shakespeare's plays. Everyone was accurately and beautifully garbed to fit his part. After this great procession had swept off the stage, the play began. It was exquisitely dressed and very well acted. The sylvan background was peculiarly fitting for this great play, inasmuch as the play is almost entirely out-of-doors. At the end of the final lovely scene, the audience rose to its feet in silent tribute to the earnest endeavors of the young actors.

Soldan's Part in the War

As we turn back the pages of Soldan's history, we find a space at which the even progress of school life is abruptly broken off. Here is what seems to be a gap. But as we note it more closely, it changes. It is no longer a gap in the history of our school; it is a part of the effort, the glory of the school itself.

Surely there is no one of us who can forget the turmoil into which the world was cast by the murder at Sarajevo in 1914! So swiftly did war envelop the entire civilized world and even reach out its greedy clutches into savage lands, that to us here in America, during its early years, the conflict seemed remote and unreal. Civilization—the life of humanity itself was threatened by an iron despotism while we, on this side of the globe held aloof, watching, horrified yet passive, as the war crushed whole nations, nations which ranked in the very organization of mankind.

But not for long could the United States refrain from participation in such a struggle. Even during the first years of that conflict, the sympathies of the American people went out to the races of Europe—those races bending and almost broken under the awful might of War. But upon the entrance of the United States into actual combat, our people aided in that war for the preservation of humanity with a whole-hearted spirit in as great a unity as was possible for a race to join.

Thus was formed the background for that great chapter of school history. For the efforts of the American people were typified by the efforts of our Soldan. The war activities of our school were the activities of a representative unit of our nation. Upon President Wilson's declaration of war, Soldan, as a unit, turned to the support of our country.

As we pore over the records of Soldan we see again the manner in which the student body, led by the faculty, devoted itself to service. Here is the story of the Gold Cross, an organization formed to direct the energies of the entire school. The name is striking; it was chosen to signify opposition to the term "Iron Cross" of Germany. The Gold Cross, in addition to its own splendid relief work, cooperated to a great extent with the American Red Cross, two chapters of which were founded here. Working with the Red Cross and the school organization, another unit of Soldan students, presided over by a member of the faculty, was established during the summer of 1918, which manufactured over one thousand articles, such as sweaters, socks and helmets.

As we turn further the pages of Soldan history, we find that all these organized groups were engaged in knitting garments, preparing and rolling bandages and assisting in the sale of War Saving Stamps and Liberty Bonds. A number of Soldan girls, operating either independently or with other war relief units, served as canvassers in the Loan drives, as four minute speakers, and as clerical workers in the War Department. Many of the Soldan alumnae—and a number of girls who were still attending school—entered the Y. M. C. A. as workers or as secretaries, while others enlisted in active service with the Red Cross field corps and as translators in the Intelligence Department. At the same time, members of the faculty engaged themselves in war work. Some of our present teachers supervised the student activities and cooperated with great national associations by organizing local chapters wherever possible. Others canvassed and solicited during the Loan drives. A number also served both at home and abroad together with students and graduates in hospital and field work with the Medical Corps and in the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A.

Out of the number of Soldan alumni and undergraduates, nearly seven hundred boys entered naval or military service. Another group of Soldan boys, under eighteen years of age and therefore ineligible for service abroad with the United States Army, were given an opportunity of active participation by enlisting in the Automotive and Mechanical Section of the American Red Cross, a unit of which was stationed at Camp Scott, Chicago. After six weeks of training these boys were attached to the Motor Transport Corps of the French Army and were duly recognized as private soldiers.

In the service of all these we take pride. For each of these people, in his own way, has added to the glory of Soldan. And, as we close this chapter of Soldan's history, let us not forget a bronze tablet which stands in the corridors of the school. It bears twenty names—the Roll of Honor. It is sacred to those twenty boys who served to the utmost and who have already witnessed their glory.

Robert N. Lawson.

To Soldan's Sons

OUTH! a keen-edged sword, a gage,
A sounding bugle blown at morn,
A striking note of harmony,
A soaring, mounting hope just born.

'Tis Youth that cares to live and love,
And Youth that dares to fight and die;
'Tis Youth that dares to tread the earth
With eyes that ever search the sky.

'Tis boyhood casting off the bonds
That check a child's too eager feet;
'Tis manhood in his first full pride—
A pride all ignorant of defeat.

And what if life should prove this pride
A heritage that fades with Youth?
Who strives, though reaching not the skies,
Gains vision-scope beyond the roof.

Truth! Honor! Freedom! Courtesy!
Our motto's flung! It gleams on high!
Its seeds are sown throughout the world
By those who, living well, so die.

Ah, lads, your lips were curved to sound
The note that blew the battle's call;
The shouts of sports have shaped those lips,
And joy; and laughter over all.

Your hearts beat high with love of life,
A love of all things true and good.
'Twas love of life as filled with right
That gave you heart at Belleau Wood.

You played and worked in school's short day,
Gained strength to face a broader world.
Then, Alma Mater, praise to thee,
To thee with banner half-upfurled.

The boys have left thy sheltering roof,
And where they fell—these heroes lay.
They took the path that mounts to Right;
Thou, Alma Mater, taught the way.

We sing to thee and to thy sons,
We sing to memory-hallowed halls,
We sing to standards raised aloft
That live, though thy foundation falls.

We sing to comrades rich in youth,
Trained to perceive the trend of right;
We sing to lads who fear not death,
Who side with Justice—not with Might.

Ye youths who sleep 'neath foreign skies,
The Spring has come to us again!
In nature, saps, life-giving, rise,
As hope within the souls of men.

Your bodies lie in grassy fields,
Winds whisper softly o'er your graves;
Your spirit lives forever on,
Immortal, to a world it saves.

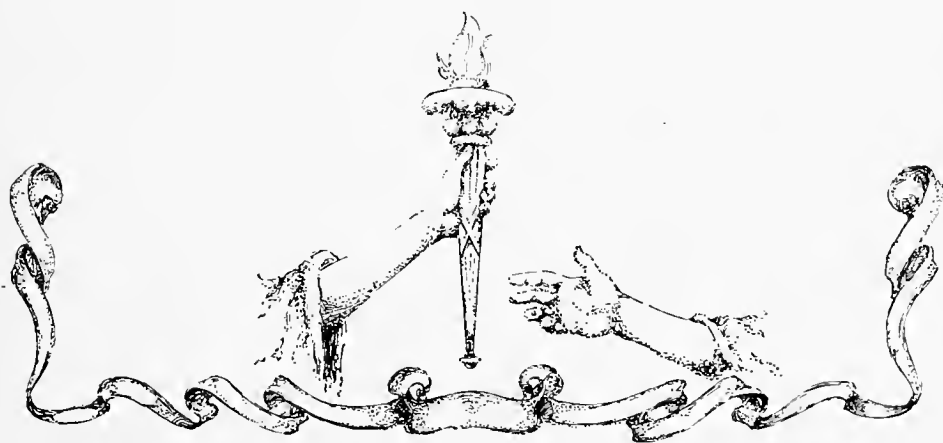

Geraldine Fennell.

Soldan High School Honor Scholarships

At the time Soldan opened in September, 1909, it was already an established custom for Washington University to award an honor scholarship to the ranking student in each graduating class of the St. Louis High Schools. But the history of Soldan scholarship holders begins with the first graduating class of January, 1911.

Since then, thirty-six such scholarships have been won by Soldan graduates. Of these honor students, twenty have attended Washington University and obtained degrees there, while nine of the more recent scholarship winners are completing their undergraduate work. Six others have obtained their degrees from different colleges of their choice. The high records of these Soldan representatives have been well maintained at college, for seven have been elected to Phi Beta Kappa, and an equal number have studied for advanced degrees.

Now, most of these Soldan honor students have completed their university work and are upholding Soldan Ideals in their service to the community. A complete list of the Washington University Honor Scholarships awarded at Soldan follows:

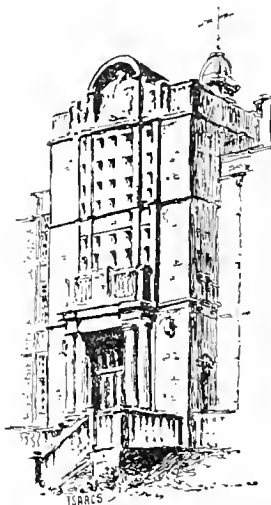

- January, 1911. Helen Bryars, A. B., 1915, Washington University.
Now Mrs. Dudley Kincaid.
- June, 1911. Marguerite Mott, A. B., 1915, Washington University.
Now teaching at Soldan High School.
- January, 1912. Constance A. Brown, A. B., 1916, Washington University. Now teaching at Cleveland High School.
- June, 1912. Estill Green, A. B., 1916, Westminster College. Now in Research Dept., American Telephone Co., N. Y.
- January, 1913. Moses D. Levy, A. B., 1917, Missouri University. Now in Angelica Jacket Mfg. Co., St. Louis.
- June, 1913. Miriam Marten, A. B., 1917, Washington University.
Now Case Supervisor, Big Sisters Org., St. Louis.
- January, 1914. Mae Levy, A. B., 1918, A. M., 1928, Washington University. Now Mrs. P. Falk.
- June, 1914. Jane Pelton, B. Arch., 1918, Washington University.
Now an Interior Decorator.
- January, 1915. Inez Schageman, A. B., 1919, Washington University.
Now Mrs. Oliver W. Kriege.

Shades of Room 126

PERHAPS there is nothing particularly ghost-like about Room 126. The appearance it presents may seem real enough—not unlike that of any other room in Soldan—but its story is one of ghosts. You may not agree with me, but then you may never have been a ghost. Certainly Room 126 has a story to tell; perhaps the most interesting tale of any that might be heard if rooms could talk. It is a tale of romance, adventure, tragedy; of dreams, hopes, and inspiration. Within the walls of Room 126 have walked the ghosts of great men and small; graceful lords in laces and velvet, courageous knights in armor and steel, fearless outlaws, almond-eyed heathens, uncouth mariners, and eager youths of every land and age. There have been ghosts also, of lovely ladies for whom the gallant knights risked their lives; with whom the not-so-gallant youths exchanged bitter words; upon whom any one of a dozen fates descended.

No doubt ghosts still walk the floor in Room 126, for it is still Soldan's Little Theater. The history of the Dramatic Guild, very likely, is repeating itself from year to year; but having been a little ghost back in Soldan's Middle Ages ('20-'21), I am here recalling from the forgotten past the ghosts of those "good old days".

Does Room 126 remember those Thursday afternoons in 1920 when certain little ghosts felt their hearts almost burst in anticipation of the time when they might tread the planks of the awe-inspiring stage? That was the year when Alene Southworth and Martin Niemoeller, the club's presidents, presented the charming little play "Quits". The very exciting playlet "The Burglar", enacted by a number of the high and mighty seniors for the "Senior Karnavull", put into many a timid heart the determination to be the best ghost that ever walked in Room 126. "Easter Chimes", "The Match Makers", and "The Fatal Message" brought other ghosts into action that year.

And so, when at the approach of spring and the annual Guild production, tryouts for "As You Like It" were held, the little ghosts were there, eager and proud of the privilege. "As You Like It" was presented on May 28 by a cast inspired by the untiring work of Miss Jennie M. A. Jones, the club's beloved director. The cast included: The Banished Duke, Paul Cornwall; Duke Frederick, Warren Drescher; Amiens, Frank Greenhall; Jacques, Martin Niemoeller; Le Beau, Wylie Todd; Charles, James McBurney; Orlando, Charles Waugh; Oliver, Robert Burns; Adam, Willard Carpenter; Touchstone, Fred Carpenter; Corin, Frank Parks; Silvius, Arthur Kehl; William, Charles Morris; Rosalind, Maude Adams; Celia, Jerene Todd; Phebe, Marian Whiteman; Audrey, Myra Woodson; Hymen, Louise Rodgers.

Does Room 126 remember when, in the fall of 1920, the little ghosts—having grown an inch or two—began to perform in true Barrymore fashion? What an exciting life for a little ghost! It was then that "The Heathen Chinees" appeared. The terrors of "A Night At An Inn" bewitched many when the shades of Room 126 were lowered (the first ceremony on any Thursday afternoon). Does Room 126 remember when, at the magical hour of midnight, the Dresden shepherd and shepherdess came to life and danced the minuet "In Arcady"? Only Room 126 would know that the quivering voices were caused not by the mystery of the hour, but by the fact that the two little ghosts just hadn't learned their parts! Does Room 126 remember the frenzied search for colored lights, because the "Dream Lady"—a little ghost who had grown up amazingly—just couldn't perform without colored lights, to the great discomfort of the poor property manager? Only Room 126 would know where he found them!

Yes, the little ghosts grew up. I suppose they still do. And this record of the Middle Ages would have no reason for existing were it not for the fact that in the spring of 1921 Miss Jones presented "The Tempest", her last play in the Dramatic Guild. It was an outstanding performance because of the inspiration that she imparted to every member of the cast.

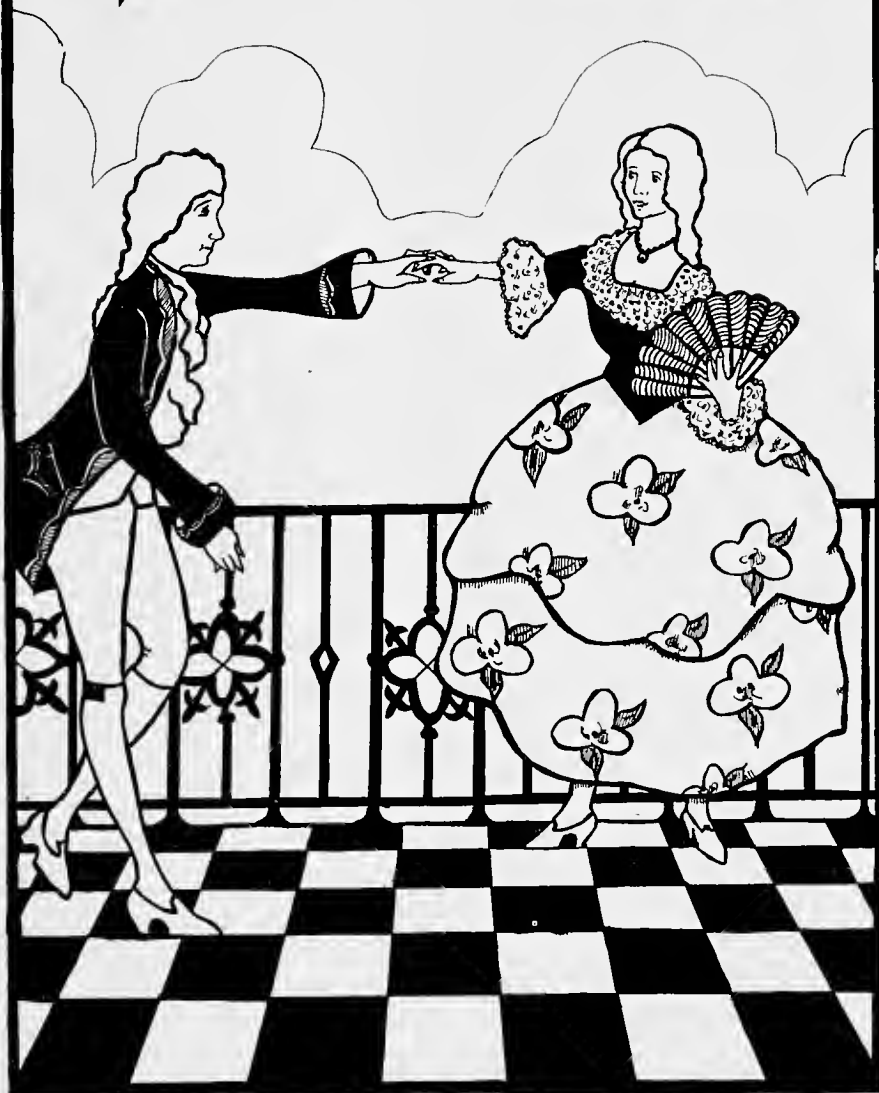

Miss Jones, in "The Tempest", achieved a perfect final gesture. It had never before been presented in St. Louis, and her sympathetic direction made it possible for high school students to present it in a manner not easily forgotten. Certainly, her kindness, her patience, her encouragement remain in the memory of those whose privilege it was to be under her guidance at that time. In the meanwhile, she has gone to her greater reward. But "to live in the hearts we leave behind is not to die"; and so she lives.

"The Tempest" was given on May 27. The cast, in part, was as follows: Ray Lange as Prospero; Fred Carpenter as Caliban; Elinor Walters as Miranda; Mary Jane Badino as Ariel. Robert Campbell, Arthur Kehl, Maxwell Corey, Allen Whittington, Hall Baetz, and Ray Cornelison also played prominent parts.

The thrill of being a little ghost in Room 126 has passed on to others. Memories remain; but Room 126 never saw those particular ghosts again.

Mary Jane Badino.

Senior Class Song

(Words by Beatrice B. Fishman; Music by Esther Blitz)

Hail to thee, our Alma Mater!
Truth and Freedom may there be.
Hear again our pledge of Honor
And unfailing Courtesy.
Brightest visions beckon to us,
May this motto be our guide:
"Seek the highest good forever"
In our paths of life untried.

Alma Mater, as you've reared us,
You have fostered in our hearts
Love for you, for Truth, for Justice,—
May these ideals ne'er depart.
In the future, marching onward,
Striving toward our goal with pride,
May these words be ours forever:
"Summum Bonum", still our guide.

ΓΝΩΘΙ ΣΕΑΥΤΟΝ

THE class motto of June, 1929, Gnothi Seauton, or Know Thyself, is ages old, and full of meaty substance for thought.

It was first inscribed on a pillar in the temple of Apollo at Delphi, whence its name as a Delphic maxim. Plutarch says that the god Apollo, by way of salutation, addressed everyone approaching the temple with the expression, "Gnothi Seauton". This motto—in company with two other Delphic maxims, "Nothing in excess", and "Go surety, and ruin is at hand"—were much admired in antiquity. Plutarch speaks of them as "streams pent up within a narrow space, for they have no transparency or lucidity of meaning". He goes on to say that those who wish to examine what has been written about these words in order to learn their true meaning, will find few treatises more lengthy than those dealing with this subject. Cicero and Juvenal speak of the divine origin of "Gnothi Seauton". Plato speaks of it as the sum of all knowledge. To Socrates, whose great crusade was directed against sham knowledge, this was the holiest of texts. He constantly cited it, and strenuously enforced it upon his hearers, interpreting it to mean "Know what sort of man thou art, and what thy capacities in reference to human use are." His great object was to impress upon his hearers that they should take just measure of their own real knowledge or real ignorance. And for him, the recognition of one's own ignorance was the beginning of wisdom. The story is that when Chaerophon asked who was the wisest man, the Delphic oracle answered that Socrates was. Socrates agreed that he was wiser than any other man in this respect: while they thought they knew and did not, he did not know and knew that he did not.

Originally, Know Thyself was intended only to remind man of his impotence before the gods (Know thyself—in thy proper relation and comparative weakness). Thru Socrates and Plato, when they adopted it as part of their thought, the whole Grecian world, and finally the entire civilized world, recognized the depth and meaning of this motto, because of its fundamental searching and primal self-examination.

These words carry one away from everyday life, and bring one back to it again, after adding a new bit of character. One delves into one's very soul, and finds secrets often important before hidden to him. Carlyle says "Tell me a man's creed, and I will tell you what kind of a man he is". Carlyle was able to adopt in his imagination the man's mental garb, and knowing it, to reproduce the man himself.

There is no shamming when one is fully aware of his own abilities and aptitudes. Each overstep is caught and remarked by those people that truly understand themselves. Also, each shirking is spied out, and energy added to it, because these people simply will not let anything be shown to the outside world that misrepresents themselves as they know they are. All modern education and psychology tend to help one to center oneself in life, to help one dig deep, and find his relationship to these other creatures, called people, or the world.

The choosing of a Greek motto in a public school is very appropriate. Despite the innate meaning of the motto itself,—as compared to modern life, a Greek motto is very significant. The Greeks were democrats and all their thoughts were democratic. We, too, in a public school are democratic, and should be able to appreciate the idea motivating Grecian art, and philosophy, and what is commonly known as culture.

John Delavan, Chairman Motto Committee.

Class Song—June, 1928

O school of many happy days!
We raise our song to you in praise;
We've tried to serve you loyally,
You have repaid us royally;
You've aided, given us our due,
You have imparted knowledge, too.
Through ever changing years and new
Will oft recur dear thoughts of you.

REFRAIN

Alma Mater, tried and true,
Soldan, we have pride in you.
May we cherish thy renown
And guard thy colors, Gold and Brown.

"Gnothi seauton", what means this Greek?
If higher knowledge you would seek,
"Know thyself", and ever strive
That you to greatness may arrive.
Your knowledge gleaned should be your start
As on life's stage you take your part,
Make Courtesy a higher art,
Keep Truth and Honor in your heart.

Mary B. Cowan.

The Music of the Spheres

NE within another, the turning spheres of Time
Give forth their wondrous music attuned to ears sublime;
Like a taut harp gently fingered by a saddened errant breeze
Which veils the tears that drench its soul with mists of melodies;
Like the chimes of dim cathedrals which, half-heard, are unbelieved;
Like sorrow's fountain flowing from the heart of some nymph grieved;—
So with harmony ineffable, thrice three, each heaven turns
And turning, strokes with ghostly hands the Lyre, which brighter burns
At that caress of vibrant chords, and stirs the stars to march
In Order's loveliness across high heaven's ebon arch.

Betty Reel, June '29.

In a Rose Garden

YRIAD colors flashing bright
In the sun's warm amber light;
Varied scents pervade the air
Drawn from sweetness everywhere.
Stately roses rear their heads
High above their lowly beds,
Yellow, red, pink and white—
Beauty rare to earthly sight;
Swayed by breezes to and fro,
Climbing roses drop below
Covering nature's verdant breast,
As silken petals come to rest;
Crouched beneath the grasses green
Pink moss roses, hardly seen,
Spread their lovely fragrance to Bees who sip the morning dew;
White heralders of bridals gay
Hold their buds in proud display:—
These and many blossoms more
Blanket earth's soft dewey floor.

The Jungle

LEEK bodies slink in dim green light
Of the jungle's breathless night,
Tangles, marshes, paths unknown
To man, but to the beasts alone
Who daily there do make their way
To water, or at break of day,
In shadowy silence stalk their prey.

Then the sun, in splendour born,
Heralds the approach of morn,
And forms a network through the trees
Of dancing figures, as the breeze
Moves verdant leafage to and fro,
While through the branches high and low
Some chattering monkey, here, then gone,
Shatters the silence of the dawn.

Anon a tropic deluge breaks
In sudden fury, and it makes
A quelléd world, and everything
Shrinks 'neath the wrath of fierce storm king.

Then quickly as it had begun,
The tempest ceases, and the sun
Shines forth upon a dripping world
Like a flag of truce unfurled.

More fiercely come Apollo's beams,
And the humid jungle teems
With busy life as each wild thing
Pursues his way on foot or wing;
Thus till night drops like a pall,
And spreads jet darkness over all.

To Learning

PRISONER, pent within his cell,
Was sleeping dully in the dark;
His body held with heavy chains
Lay on the cobbles, stiff and stark.
A narrow opening high above
Admitted moonlight soft and cool
Which seemed to whisper in the gloom,
"Rise up, go forth you sluggish fool."

And as the light of early morn
Came thru the slit, the prisoner sighed.
The light grew strong, he stirred and moved.
The chains fell off; he leaped and cried.
The door sprang wide, he rushed outside
The world to him was freshly whole.
The light was knowledge joined with will
To bring him freedom for his soul.

Meditations of the Great Stone Face

HEAD of Stone,
How many nights have hid your face
From sight, to let the dawn confront
Your fixed gaze of sleepless eyes
Turned ever toward some future age?
What outcome do you see of years
To come with unknown destinies,
Or is it down the years gone by
You watch with penetrating gaze?
O Face, how many centuries
Have dropped into the gulf of Time
Like leaves of your adjoining trees?
The Sphinx is young compared to you!
Grim model of the coming race,
Did not your stern lips condescend
To smile, when pigmies first you saw,
Men fashioned in your own true form?
What mystic sagas could you tell—
The secrets of the Universe!
Your lips are sealed.

Old Friends

HE next nine pages for to-night.”
To say it, seems quite all right,
But when it's Chaucer you're to read
It makes a difference, yes indeed!
Now first we hear about the knight
And how so bravely he did fight.
Then comes the squire with hair of gold,
Who danced and wrote and sang, we're told.
A knight's yoeman there was also
In a green coat and hood he'd go.
Then comes our dainty Eglentine
With ways and manners very fine.
Likewise we find the manly monk
Who thought that study was the “bunk”.
He loved to hunt with horses fine
And in that sport he spent much time.
Now if we are still at our work,
We'll hear about the Oxford clerk
Who on his horse, thin as a rake,
Many books for his trip did take.
A Merchant, Sergeant, and Shipman,
Country Gentleman, and Plowman,
Also a Doctor, and a Friar,
A Carpenter, Reve, and Dyer.
All traveled without a charter
To seek the holy, blissful martyr.
Since I've named these it's only fair
To mention the rest who are there.
A Weaver, Cook, and Pardoner,
Good Wife of Bathe, and Summoner,
Gentil Maunciple, and Miller,
A Parson, and Hat seller.
And last, but not least, we find
The brilliant Host who was so kind
As to offer to be the guide
And travel along at their side.
So with this jolly company
They started out on their journey
From England to Canterbury
Feeling quite happy and merry.

The Wanderer's Song

HEAR a sound as of a voice
Calling; I know not where.
And I cannot but up and on,
Searching; I know not where.

And in my dreams I see a face
Bidding; I know not why.
And I cannot but up and on,
Hoping; I know not why.

And in myself I feel a force
Urging; I know not what.
And I cannot but up and on,
Seeking; I know not what.

My heart is longing for someone's hand,
Craving; I know not whom.
And I cannot but up and on,
Wanting; I know not whom.

And so I must go on and on Dreaming; I know not what.
And I cannot but up and on,
Searching; I know not what.

TRONG ram and nimble goat,
Like weather-beaten rock your coat,
Round marshy pond and salt your deep-sunk tracks teem,
And at the foot of many precarious leaps.
You crop sparse blue-bells on the peaks
While lush grass sprouts by sunny valley stream.

The Open Sea

VISITED Elysium.

There were bowers
Bright with honey-scented flowers.
Lilies blooming in full splendor shone;
Loose-petaled roses swayed full-blown;
And far away there boomed the sea.
The wind brought faint to me
The smell of roaring, booming salty sea.

I cannot linger here.
The gardens, lovely though they be,
Ponds, lily laden, fair to see—
Yet so near the open ocean,
Heaving, rolling with a steady motion,
Calling—I'll go away,
Down to the sea,
And sail its salty depths, and spray
Will splash my hardened cheek—
Cold water, like the first frost of clear November day,
And the white-topped, frothing waves will beat
And toss about my galleon fleet.

Gardens of Elysian clime,
Be ye ornate, so sublime,
There is beauty, pleasure more
Roving on the open shore.
Be the sand a floor of shells,
Dainty pink, like fairy bells,
There is beauty more for me
Out upon the open sea.

Henry Lowenhaupt, January '29.

Mountain Columbine

MOUNTAIN columbine, companion of the everlasting snows,
Daring to peep where the westwind keeps
His wintry domain, sulphur sun and hail,
Shifting clouds over rugged rocks, green icebergs and the ever tugging gale;
Numb springs seep; the pale noon silence shattered by a marmot's call.

Betty Lowenhaupt, January '29.

Youth

MOOL and white the sand beach lay
Beneath our willing feet
And Youth and I, alone, did stray
Through night that was starless and sweet.

Defying the brilliance of the moon,
A beach fire sparkled on the sand,
And Youth and I, our hearts in tune,
Wandered towards it hand in hand.

We heeded not to-morrow's dawn.
We had forgotten yesterday,
And joy we knew to be not long
We centered in our one to-day.

Our elders say that we must part,
Each to go his separate way—
I to live life's bigger part
And Youth with someone else to play.

Youth and I have been good friends,
We've known each other such a little while,
Seventeen Aprils and twenty Mays—
I heard someone say
Just the other day,
"Time goes by so slowly".

To Netley Abbey

EXQUISITE stone work wrought by mortal hand,
A distant corner scarcely sought by man,
In beauty, rare old Abbey Netley lies
On earth a ruined bit of Paradise.
A dream ethereal realized in stone
And half-destroyed by age's ceaseless drone
With walls graced by that green scar-healing rod
It stands today a monument for God.
Who sees the lace work of those clamouring vines,
He feels the kindred work of all man-kind
And knows the blessing of a Hand Divine.

The Storm

HE Sea Queen's bosom scarcely heaved
As she slept on a couch of pearl.
The Wind King swooped and kissed her there
With his cloud robes all aswirl.

But she rose in wrath and queenly ire
And donned her fragile mail
Of watered silk from seaweeds green,
All linked with silver pale.

See how she rides on a dolphin sleek
And stirs the sea to foam.
She skims the waves like a bird in flight
When it would seek to roam.

The King grows angry; his lightning plays
Like the foils of celestial knights.
The air resounds with the thunderbolts
He hurls through the fitful lights.

The lightning nips the waves. A hush
Whose silence seems like sound,
Rebukes the surging flood. The Queen
In sleep again is bound.

Betty Reel.

To R

REAKING the stillness of the night,
The coursing wind,
The moaning surf,
The fitful gleam of a far-flung light—
These have disturbed my wild soul's rest.
Like the beating wings of a white gull's flight,
My heart beats clam'rous at the sight
Of rain-soft skies,
Of purple land,
Of the white waves' wash on the browning sand.

Mary B. Cowan.

PANISH moss in gray festoons,
Across the stagnant black lagoons;
A cypress tree on either side,
An araucaria spreading wide,
Cobras coiled on the marshy ground,
Lizards gliding from a mound;
Monkeys chattering in the trees,
The hum of gnats, the buzz of bees.
A butterfly of wondrous hue,
Goes flitting in and out of view;
The humming birds of plumage bright
Seem like gleams of colored light.
The fly-bird haunting each dark glade
Starts at each sound, and is afraid.
From shady branches bird nests cling,
Built and watched by a pouched starling.
Green parrots on a higher limb,
Prepare for night, in darkening dim;
And on the jungle night airs steal,
Making the forest seem unreal,
Wild beasts of night begin to prowl,
The jackals whine, the tigers growl,
The moon sends down her pale-green light
And spreads on earth, the cloak of night.

MIRRE

WHITE

Two Twos for a One

AMELS, please."

Joe, the owner, janitor, clerk, and general what-not of "Joe's Smoke House", at this moment was "star-gazing" out into a bleak, dismal October day, which showed no signs of weakening. Rain had been falling in a slow, aggravating drizzle for the two hours since lunch. He got up from his seat by the blurred window, and complied with the request.

"This sure is a mess of a day." Joe said this merely to break the silence of the smoke house.

"It is, and—" But here his speech, and the silence was disturbed by a big, burly man dashing through the door, and across to the counter.

"Quick, Brother, two twos for a one! There's my bus!"

As if hit with a whip, Joe leaped into action. He banged the "No Sale" key on the register and made the change. The stranger scooped it up and with a "Thanks" called over his shoulder, was gone.

"Always like to help a guy like that," said Joe, to the lone customer, "I was in the same fix once myself." He chuckled, "The way that bird dashed in here! Two twos for a one—" He shot a hurried look at the bill in his hand.

"Why—why that guy!"

He dashed out of the smoke house, yelling like a mad man.

"Stop, thief! Hold that man! He's a crook!"

But as he reached the sidewalk, he saw the bus already in the distance.

Joe dashed back into the store.

"Quick! Closing up," he ordered to his only customer, who was already on his way to the outside to watch developments.

Joe turned the key in the lock, and was running off as though a man-eating lion were behind him. A yellow vehicle parked at the curb gave him an idea. He jumped into the cab.

"Catch that bus," he ordered.

"Caught," came over the driver's shoulder, as he sped off.

As Joe drove away he did not notice a puzzled man trying the locked door of his establishment.

The cab shot forward at a hazardous and law-breaking speed. It gained rapidly on the bus.

"Pass it up and let me off a block ahead."

"O. K."

The bus was just crossing an intersecting boulevard. As it got across, the sign in the middle of the street switched to "Wait, Traffic Change."

"Go through it."

But the driver slid to a stand-still.

"I don't mind breakin' some laws, but that's dangerous, crook or no crook."

To Joe, the few moments he was detained by the law seemed an eternity. He had his eye on the bus all the time. He saw it stop for passengers, start, and lost it as it turned the corner.

At last the white flashed on again, and the driver was off.

The taxi was soon at the corner, where Joe gave a shout of joy. He heard the clanging of the bell, at the grade crossing around the corner.

"That'll stop 'em," he shouted, but, as the cab turned the corner, he slumped down in his seat with a groan. The bus was already safely across, and the gates were slowly but surely coming down.

It was a freight; a long freight, a long, slow freight. The time it took to pass was at least two or three hours to the nerve-wracked passenger in the taxi. However, the welcome caboose was finally in sight. He tried to look through the spaces between the cars as they went by, but to no avail. For all he knew, the bus was out of sight by now. Finally the caboose rumbled across, and almost before the gates went up, the taxi was off.

"Now, step on it!" came orders from the back seat.

The bus was soon in sight. In a short time the cab was almost upon it.

"All right, next corner," said Joe, and thrust a bill in the driver's pocket.

Joe got out of the cab and waited for the bus at the passenger's stop. But as the bus came on it did not slacken its speed. As it went by, the conductor on the rear platform waved and shouted, "Full House."

Joe did not try to suppress any curses. If his speech were reproduced here, the story would be censored.

The cab by this time had turned around and was heading homeward. However the driver was glad to turn again for a passenger, and soon the duo was once more in the chase. The two vehicles were soon side by side. Joe leaned out of the window.

"Stop that bus, there's a crook on it."

The bus driver raised the window and put out his head.

"Huh?"

"Stop, there's a crook on your bus!"

"What do you think this is, Buddy, the 'Wagon'?"

"He's on your bus. Tried to get two twos for a one!"

This remark, coupled with the worried look of the speaker, gave the driver an impression, for he muttered, "Poor guy's bug-house."

"Get me on! You can take another one!"

"What did the guy you're after look like?"

"Big fellow—moustache."

"Got off two blocks back."

"You can't kid me. I know he's—"

But the driver had closed the window and was holding up a sign:—"Do not talk to operator."

Joe's speech will be left out, for various reasons. However, he cooled off, and told the driver to follow the bus till somebody got off. After a long ride this happened, and Joe was finally stepping on the bus. He stormed onto the lower deck, looking at all the occupants, to their embarrassment and surprise, but nobody was there that even resembled the stranger in the smoke house. He searched top and bottom, bottom and top, and top and bottom again, but to no avail.

The conductor approached.

"Fares, please."

"I'm not going to pay you! If you'd let me on the first time this wouldn't have happened."

"Oh, you're not going to pay, eh?"

"You heard me. One side, I'm getting off!"

"Just sit down, Buddy. You're going to the end of the line!"

The motorman called the conductor to him, as the latter was trying to put Joe in a seat.

After a little conversation on the part of the crew of the bus, the proprietor of the Smoke House was let off, to the relief of the passengers.

It was growing dark as Joe dragged himself up the five steps to the house where he boarded. He was wet, tired, and he had lost four dollars. His head felt as though it would pop open any minute. He climbed the three flights to his room, third floor back, and flopped on the bed.

"A mess of a day, right," escaped his lips.

As Joe came to work next morning, he saw a familiar figure in front of the Smoke House.

He started with surprise.

"There he is," he exclaimed with an oath under his breath, "He'll not get away this time!"

But as he approached, the familiar figure started the conversation.

"Say, Brother, remember when I got change in your store yesterday? Well, here's three dollars of yours."

Lurking Shadows

NE fine summer day as I was walking down a street in Boston, I happened to notice a fine old colonial house, which caught my fancy and straight way I made up my mind to find out why it was not occupied. It showed signs of long disuse, especially the lawn, which was a tangle of the rankest growth of grass I have ever seen. I inquired of some children, playing down the street, about the house, and they answered that it was the haunted house. I laughed and passed on, taking this for one of those childhood fancies, that after a house has been vacant so long, it becomes haunted.

A week or so later I decided to revisit the district in which the colonial house was located. As I turned upon the street several blocks to the north of the place, I saw a truck passing, filled with debris. My mind was filled with apprehension, and the sight of two more trucks, parked in the vicinity of the old mansion only added to my alarm, for I could not understand why such a fine old place should be torn down, when a little paint and repairing would have made it as good as new. I hastened on and soon came upon the scene of destruction. The roof was gone and the men were beginning on the ceiling of the second floor.

I was now more determined than ever to know the history of the house, so I went to the foreman and asked him where I could find out about the house. He said that he had lived there and so knew it himself. Here it is, as nearly in the words he used as I can remember.

"Many years ago a family of five, three sisters and their two brothers, one a prominent lawyer, the other an unscrupulous doctor, lived here. The men, who sometimes quarreled violently, gradually became so antagonistic that they fussed all the time. One evening they were arguing in an upstairs room. The ladies paid no attention because they had grown accustomed to these frequent fits of passion. However, after some time had passed and the voices kept growing louder and angrier, they became alarmed and started to go to the room, thinking to settle the argument. Upon arriving at the second floor they heard a terrible scream and a thud as of some body coming in contact with another body. They ran to the door, but found it locked; they called, but no answer came from within. After some few minutes had passed, footsteps were heard within the room, and the doctor, smiling evilly, opened the door. Fearfully, they entered and beheld their other brother slumped in a chair, his glazed eyes staring at them and the forefinger of one hand, by some trick of fate, pointing toward the door, where his brother stood. There was nothing to indicate that he had died an unnatural death, except a thin red line about an inch long on the left side of his throat. There was no blood anywhere, on his clothes, on the floor, or on the furniture. The sisters stood like statues, so overwhelmed were they at this sudden calamity. They were suddenly jarred back to earth by the grating of the key in the lock, and turning, they saw the door had been shut. The front door slammed and outside a piercing, inhuman wail rose on the wings of the wind and was whipped about among the swaying elms, gripping the hearts of the listeners like the icy claw of time.

The next day the papers contained an article concerning the suicide of an unidentified man. And that evening the sisters sat up with the body of their brother, the lawyer, which had been placed in the front room of the house. Four candles were lighted; two at the head, and two at the foot, of the casket. Suddenly one of the sisters uttered a scream of horror and pointed, for there on the opposite walls two dark spots were forming. With each passing moment these became larger and darker. In a very short while they assumed the attitude of two men crouching opposite each other and they became very distinct. Thoroughly horrified now, the sisters hung drapes before the scene, but the shadows came right through the drapes. Upon seeing this and also that nothing was causing it, they became quite frightened and resolved to move away from the house immediately after the funeral. At last dawn came and with it the shadows disappeared. On the next night everything happened as it had the night before. But on the third night the shadows, after becoming as distinct as on the other two nights, suddenly leapt forward and clasped each other in a death-like embrace. The next morning the funeral was held and that afternoon the sisters left,—never to be heard of again. Since that time five different families, of which mine was one, have rented the house, and each was driven out by those infernal shadows, which have remained, despite the fact that the wall has been repapered for each new occupant, so the owners, for the sisters and brothers had only rented the house, are tearing it down and plan to build on its site a new, modern apartment."

Here the foreman ended his tale and I told him I did not believe it. He immediately took me up on my unbelief and we made arrangements to meet that night at nine to go into the house. Fortunately the night was pitch black, and we met at the hour agreed upon, went in, using our flashlights. He knew his way around and so directed me to the front room. Standing on one side of the room he flashed his light on the other, and there, I beheld those grim spectres, the lurking shadows.

John Lampe, 8.

Tragedy

FOR the last five days that consistent growling and grumbling had been going on through the whole family. This was too much for Beno, who, although only seventeen years old, seemed to be the center of the attack when anyone became angry. Why should he, by far the most innocent of the four, be picked on so much? Why could not his sister, who was at that time nearly twenty, get some of the blame? Well, he would not stand it much longer. He would give them one more chance and then leave for good. Yes, for good. He would show them.

Sure enough, the next morning his sister, who always arose late, wanted Beno to get her mail for her. It was only three flights of stairs down to the mail box. It would not hurt him, she said. Beno, who was just about ready to leave for school, shot back an answer which did not please his sister very much. Why should I get your confounded mail? Get up and get it yourself; you never do anything anyway. You can just hop in the creek! That is what you can do!

"Beno!" came the sharp sound of his mother's voice, "The idea of you talking to your sister in such a manner. She asked a very simple question and if you had any respect for your parents at all, you would never talk like that. You two children are getting to be just like cats and dogs. I have never seen the like."

"Aw, there you go bawling me out again. Why don't you ever bawl her out?"

"That will be enough out of you, young man! Not another word," shot back the mother.

Making very funny, grumbling noises deep in his throat, Beno walked to his room. There he picked up his hat, took the remaining eight dollars of his allowance from a dresser drawer, and walked out again. He would show them. They would be sorry. Without another word, he walked out of the house. Where would he go? That was the first question that confronted his blurred brain. For nearly ten minutes he stood at the bottom of the steps trying to think of a place to go. As nature had been good to him, he had grown to a height of five feet, ten inches. He could very easily lie about his age and wander around with the rest of the outcasts. Pulling his hat on a bit tighter he walked away.

"Good-bye, for a while anyway," he said bitterly, as he sauntered away.

For two weeks he wandered until his money gave out. Then another question confronted him. How was he to live? His heart was heavy and his clothes were beginning to show the wear of a park bench and the ground. He was tempted to take small things that did not belong to him. He did not call it stealing. He was just kinda, well, he did not know exactly just what he would call it.

Days turned to weeks and the weeks turned into months. Not once had he heard from his parents or had they heard from him. He was out for revenge and they would never find him. It would never do for them to find him now because at the end of the year, as most petty thieves do, he had turned to be crooked.

Beno was still young but had grown, in the last year, to be a massive giant in build and like an ox in strength. He had become very good looking but was still a woman hater.

Night after night Beno stole things until he reached the time that he was to be dreaded and was a hunted man. Often after a night's work, he would sit in some secluded spot and dream of his home and his parents, whom he had not seen for nearly three years. At last, one night, his conscience got the best of him and he resolved to go home. He had found an apartment a few days before in which he figured he could get a remarkable amount of money. He would work that job and quit. Home! Wouldn't it be wonderful, he thought.

Night came and Beno started out. After riding on the cars for nearly an hour he came to the apartment. The house looked easy to him. After feeling in his pockets for his tools and his automatic, he carefully sneaked up the back steps. The door was easy and everything went fine until he reached the hallway. Here he made a great blunder by stepping on some kind of an animal. A loud "meow" issued and a cat scampered away.

"Gee," he murmured. "I wonder what will happen now?"

He did not have long to wait for a dark figure stole out from a doorway and Beno knew it was the man of the apartment. That did not worry Beno. He was trying to think of a way to get by the man. Evidently he could be seen. He saw the man raise an arm which pointed straight at him. Ducking as quick as lightning, and at the same time whipping out his automatic, he fired. Once! Twice! A scream and a thump was heard as the man collapsed and two white figures rushed out of the darkness to the side of the dead man. Lights flashed and Beno gasped! "My God! Father! Mother!"

"My son," cried his mother and rushed for his side, but too late.

Beno, gasping at the horrible sight of his dead father and his hysterical mother and sister, realized what he had done, and without thinking, raised the revolver to his head and sent a bullet crashing to his brain. That was all. Just the end of another misspent life.

Madness

Y friends have, for a year, wondered at the obvious breach between my brother and me. For some months they have been dropping from me. But even that concerns me but little. My chief desire now is to review, if only to myself, the events leading up to my estrangement from the only other living member of my family.

My brother, Wilbur Inglis, was without a doubt, at one time the finest horseman in America. His name has gone down in the records of the Haarstick Riding as its most celebrated rider, and in the memories of other devotees of the saddle as the truest of sportsmen. Even I am forced, not now by any fraternal affection surely, to acknowledge that in his prime, thirteen years ago, he was the most perfect figure of a man I had ever known.

I might add that I myself was by no means a poor horseman, and, owing to this, was quite a favorite with the younger members of the club—these composing the bulk of the society in which Wilbur and I lived.

But I must not enter upon any long description of myself. The story begins at the New Year Ball which all of the gentlefolk of the region were wont to attend. Here, for the first time, I met her of whom I had dreamed since youth. I was little more than a youth at the time of which I write, but by the sight of her under that blaze of lights in the ballroom of the old club, I was so blinded to all else about me that, at first, I failed to notice her escort, Mr. Allyn. He owned the estate just north of the Haarstick territory and although he had been a friend of my family, I had seen little of him for several years after the death of my uncle with whom I was living. The few glimpses I had of him were either on the riding circle at the club or at some such function as this.

I was especially surprised as I compared him with his companion. For he was a man, who, in spite of his vigorous exercise, chiefly on horseback, had begun to bend under the weight of his years. This especially so since his daughter—I had never seen her—had left for school in Europe some years before. The girl, on the other hand, appeared little more than a child; perhaps in her late 'teens. But without a doubt she was the girl whom I had previously visualized in my youthful dreams.

Some idea might be obtained of my rapture in the fact that I was so intent on the beautiful image she presented as they approached, that I was unconscious of all else until Mr. Allyn's voice—it sounded as if he had spoken before and received no answer—awakened me once more to consciousness of those about me.

"I am happy to see you this evening, David," he greeted me. "But then, you are not one to miss the New Year Celebration. This," he went on, "is my daughter, June."

Then, turning to the girl: "June, I do not believe you and David have ever met, but you surely remember his uncle, my friend Henry Inglis?"

I know now that, at the moment, all of my self-possession was gone. I stammered something about his charming daughter; but, while the sound of my voice recalled me from my waking dreams of the ideal, still it had not restored full consciousness to me because, try as I will, I cannot remember my exact reply. So enraptured was I by her presence that I am not, even now, mindful of any occurrence of the time except that I danced almost the entire evening with her, to the apparent annoyance of the other young men. Later I accompanied her and her father to their home, where before bidding me a good night, Mr. Allyn placed his hand upon my shoulder.

"David," he smiled, "I want you to visit us more often. You know you have been rather neglecting us. I am having a few friends to dinner Wednesday evening. I shall be expecting you and your brother."

"Thank you, Mr. Allyn," I replied; "I'm sure you can depend upon us. Good night, sir. Good night, Miss Allyn."

On the next Wednesday night, Wilbur was dining with a few of his own friends. Consequently he was forced to send his apologies for not appearing, but I made quite sure that nothing would interfere with my engagement. Upon my arrival at the Allyn home, I was welcomed warmly by both Mr. Allyn and his daughter, who, indeed, seemed unusually cordial. After greetings had been exchanged, I was presented to the other guests. These were for the most part elderly people, friends of Mr. Allyn. I was, therefore, able to see more of June during the course of the evening than I would had there been many of the younger clique present.

After dinner the men gathered for a little chat, during which I discovered in our host a most intense interest in the activities of the saddle. He was very pleasant and gave me to understand that he looked forward to a renewed acquaintance between the two families. On the morrow, he said, he would take a turn on horseback about the grounds of the club. His purpose was, primarily to introduce his daughter into the membership of the Haarstick Riding. I was profoundly delighted then, when he mentioned the fact that it would be well for me to meet them there.

Soon the ladies joined us again and the assembly became more general. June was among them, but no opportunity presented itself of talking quietly to her, and I prepared to leave rather early. After I took my leave of her father, he turned away, and June herself addressed me as I was departing.

"Aren't you going to bid me good night, Mr. Inglis?" she asked.

"Why—uh—of course, Miss Allyn," I replied. "I sought for you but was unable to disengage you for even a moment."

"Father tells me you are to meet us at the Club tomorrow."

"Yes. It was kind of him to invite me to join you. Do you ride much?"

"At every opportunity. Won't you come again soon? In spite of the cold, we could ride almost anywhere. I am most eager to explore the estate again now that I am home."

"Well, I am even more eager to become acquainted with the place now. May I come any time?"

"Of course. You won't forget about tomorrow?"

"I couldn't."

"Good night then—David."

"I'll see you tomorrow—June."

I drove homeward as though in a dream. She had called me David! And I had called her June. Surely she loved me. For the expression I had surprised in her eyes on leaving told that. And she must have seen my devotion. Even so, I would have to let her know definitely; show her my feelings. But for this night, I was happy enough. It—the other could wait.

On the morrow, and on many of the days following, I rode about the country with June. Sometimes we were joined by her father or by Wilbur, in whom I soon recognized a rival. He became, after the first few meetings, almost childlike, a more daring horseman than ever, in hope of attracting her attention by his very recklessness. And I feared him. I feared his gayety and desire to "show off". I feared his power over all with whom he came in contact.

But I soon grew to believe that my jealousy was not so well founded for, in spite of my handsome brother, June continued as she had been when we first met. And by the time spring arrived, in a desire to thrust aside all danger of Wilbur's growing regard for her, I mustered courage, on one of our rides together, to turn my mount directly before hers and to declare, simply and almost abruptly: "I love you, June. No doubt you've seen it in all my actions since I first met you. You care for me too; don't you?"

And I shall never forget, not even after what has happened since, the look that was in her eyes as she met my gaze. My heart fairly pounded as I waited for her to speak.

"I—I know, David. I'm so—so happy and—and proud." Then she burst into tears as I drew up and reached over for the bridle of her horse.

A secret engagement undoubtedly seemed more romantic. Therefore we jealously guarded the news and, in the preparations for marriage, June and I paid little attention to the rumor that my brother had accepted a wager concerning a new stallion recently purchased by a certain Henry Collier, one of the members of the Haarstick Riding. It was a vicious beast, by some declared unconquerable. But, because of Wilbur's reputation as a rider, no one of his immediate friends doubted, in any way, his ability to curb the spirit of any animal he might mount.

But shortly before the day set for the event, Wilbur returned from a call upon the Allyns in visibly low spirits.

"What have you been doing?" I ask jestingly. "Did the fair Lady June turn you down?"

"Yes. That's just what did happen. You know, old fellow, I thought a lot of her. Fact is, one might say I'm crazy about her."

"Yes?" For just a moment I felt a shiver of anxiety.

"Yes," he replied, "I told her, but she said no. Seemed almost apologetic, but refused to give me any actual reason. Simply said no."

But even such an incident as that had little effect upon Wilbur. By the next morning he was his old self; and by the day chosen for the ride, he was fairly bubbling over with vitality.

"Well, Dave," he called in greeting to me that morning, "we'll show 'em today how to handle horses and women."

"You may handle the horse, brother o'mine," I returned, "but you'll find the women a bit different, I'm thinking."

"Don't know about that. If I manage this stallion for old Collier, she ought to pay a little more attention to me. I've seen her a few times since she turned me down, you know."

"No, I didn't know it."

"Well I have. She was quite agreeable. I swear she almost hinted that she might take more notice of me after I win that bet today. I have to go now, Dave. You'll be at the Club to see me ride, won't you?"

With that he left me. Disloyal as I knew it was to her, I was unable to dismiss from my mind Wilbur's words spoken so carelessly and with such assurance. But that was like him. He would never believe, not for an instant, that anyone could refuse him anything he wanted.

It was a small crowd that gathered upon the paddock that day. There were no outsiders; merely Wilbur, Collier, June and her father, and a few grooms, as I arrived. Wilbur, of course, was as self-confident as a man could be. I do not believe that even Collier himself doubted his victory over the animal. But whatever the spectators thought, the horse had ideas all his own. Truth to tell, he had the air of one deliberately considering each factor of the affair; seeking the most efficient method of unseating his opponent. I use the word "opponent" because what followed seemed to me more of a combat between two like individuals than a contest between man and horse.

The animal started out across the paddock "sunfishing", twisting about in such manner that first one side then the other would be uppermost. At intervals he would rear, shaking his entire body, but each time he would be pulled to his haunches by the man upon him. The struggle, in its violence, rendered useless any skill on the part of the rider. It was merely a man's strength pitted against that of a horse. Each time the latter arose he was dragged down before he could turn completely about.

The affair, I believe, lasted but a few seconds. It was over before any of use could clearly understand its violence. I am still unable to recall exactly how it occurred, but, following a series of vicious twists, the horse reared, and for once the man upon him was unable to bring him down. They went over backward, and I saw my brother crash down beneath the saddle with the stallion on top of him.

He lived, but he was no longer the Wilbur Inglis I had known. Instead, within two weeks after the fall, he was brought home from the hospital, white and weak, propped in his chair. The doctor said that he would never ride—or walk again. And shortly after his return, June, in answer to my pleas for an early marriage, informed me by note that our engagement was ended.

All the fear and agony of my being must have shown in my face as I sought her explanation. When I arrived at the Allyn home I was told that she was walking about the grounds. I saw that the expression of my face must have revealed the purpose of my visit far better than any words could have done. For, on meeting her, before I could speak, she led me to a seat upon the ground beside her overlooking a stretch of road down which we had often ridden.

"I know what you came to say, David," she began. "But I just couldn't keep you from knowing any longer."

"Knowing what, June?"

"About our engagement. I—Oh, David, I must have loved you that day you told me. I think I may love you even now—or I wouldn't feel the way I do."

"But why did you send that note? I can't see—"

"Because Wilbur and I were married the day before he was brought home." She waited a moment for me to fully absorb the meaning of her words. Then she continued: "Don't you understand? He loved me and he—"

"But you don't love him! You know you don't. You just said that you love me."

"I don't know what it is. I'm not so sure but that I love him. He needs me so much."

"That's not love. That's pity. We all feel that way toward him."

"It's done now, David. We can't change it. Don't look that way. Can't we just try to—to forget?"

That was twelve years ago. Since then people have often wondered at the devotion of his beautiful wife. Men seemed to understand; because they called him the truest of sportsmen. For not a meet or a race has been held at Haastick Riding without my brother's attendance. After his accident, even though unable to ride, himself, he sat as a spectator at every event of the turf he could reach. Even I, after the first bitterness of June's loss had been put behind, looked upon him as something noble, braver than any of his fellows. Even today I am the only man who fully understands him. Fortunately June is no longer with us; for if she had been living a year ago and had attended the November meet at the Club, she surely would have beheld what I did. I do not believe she could have endured it.

Anyone who was there can, no doubt, recall the accident which occurred before the stands. Colonel House's mare, Scarab, was being put over the water jumps just in front of the box Wilbur and I occupied. She collided with a horse next to her as they took the jump together. The other animal swerved and kept its footing, but Scarab stumbled and went down upon her rider in much the same manner Collier's stallion crushed Wilbur twelve years before.

I was actually sick as I witnessed the sight, and attempted to shield Wilbur from it by moving into his way until I could get him to turn his head. But, horrible as it is, when I turn to block off his view of the field, he pushed me aside to watch a bright bay mare struggling to rise from off a still form. I saw his face then and realized that here he was watching a long expected event. I understood at last why he had witnessed so many meets and races. He was smiling.

Dongola

OR three years the greatest mystery surrounded the resignation of four young men from the employ of the Anglo-Oriental Lumber Co. Each of them had thrown up what promised to be an excellent position, a branch managership at least. Each was a trusted employee, steady and capable in his work. And yet, each of them had left the company's service without any apparent reason whatever.

The explanation of their behavior had recently come to light in the form of a letter to William Frobisher, Superintendent of the home office in Liverpool. It came from one, Clyde Flemming, the first of these young men who were sent out from England to the branch post. He had been the most promising of the number, but also the one who retained the position for the shortest space of time. By way of introduction, he apologized for his abrupt leave-taking and for his failure to give any adequate reasons for his conduct. He stated that, fearful of becoming involved in the examination being made into the fate of his immediate superior, he wished to describe the man's disappearance.

The rest of his letter reads thus:—"If you will remember, sir, you called at my office a little over two years ago. You explained to me that you had received a wire from Packer stating that he needed a reliable man to aid him in a certain matter which had recently come up in the Dongola territory. You declared that I was the very man for the assignment, and you also dropped the hint that you were becoming weary with Packer's continuous calls for assistance in a task which any competent man could handle for himself.

"I remember your exact words. You said: 'If the man is unable to fill the bill, then I'll have to find someone who can. Therefore, I want you to study this Dongola district and see what you can pick up. Incidentally, you can assist Packer in that affair of his, and learn something of his duties.'

"In obedience to your orders, I made arrangements by wire with the Bombay manager for my reception at the steamer. He, in turn, informed Packer of my plan to proceed from Bombay to Sringuna where I was to meet him.

"I shall not bother you, Mr. Frobisher, with the details of my journey to Singuna, except to say that your Bombay manager has his district in hand perfectly. But at Sringuna I was indeed relieved to meet Packer, who, contrary to my expectations, appeared to be quite energetic, an excellent worker and competent manager.

"During the five days' journey up the river to the branch headquarters at Vombool, I respected his apparent taciturnity and spent my time in studying the man. He was not strong; his nerves were in a very bad condition. This, I decided, must be the penalty paid by some men for too long a stay in the tropics. His health obviously depended upon his returning to a more temperate climate at once. By the way, sir, this country is just lousy, if I may use the term, with fever and cholera. When I mentioned it to him he agreed, but declared that matters at the post were in such a state that he could not possibly leave. However, he said that as soon as I had learned something of the conditions, he would apply to the home office for a transfer, or failing that, that he would be forced to resign for the sake of his health. It seems that he had asked for an assistant simply to be able to seek a post in a cooler climate as soon as his successor had become familiar with the business.

"Late that afternoon we arrived at Vombool—it could be called a town only by courtesy. The place consisted of a wooden stockade, inside of which were about twenty cabins—or huts—housing something like an hundred natives, a warehouse, and a more pretentious cottage for Packer. In this, he said, would be room enough for us both. Here his house-boy relieved us of our luggage, and I was able to stretch for the first time since leaving Sringuna. That night, after dinner, he offered to explain to me why he had been, for some time, requesting assistance in his management of the post. He drew his chair close to mine and leaned over. 'Flemming,' he asked, in almost a whisper, 'do you carry a gun?' In reply, I drew from my back pocket a .380 automatic.

" 'Well, in the first place,' he continued, 'that thing may be all right back home, but here you want something with stopping power; like this.' From under his vest—he always wore one without a coat—he drew a .45 and handed it to me for inspection.

" 'There,' he went on, 'is a gun. You also notice that I carry it under my arm; the draw is quicker that way, see?' And he gave me a demonstration. You can throw a gun in one motion that way, but carrying it where you do, it's necessary to reach back and then pull it up. However, I'm not going to start a class in marksmanship just now. I merely said this in order to impress upon you the fact that you should never be unarmed as long as you stay here. Keep a gun within twelve inches of your hand even when you sleep.'

" 'Ah!' thought I, 'Just as I expected. The man has made enemies of some of the natives and now he can't handle them.' But for Packer I donned my most interested air. 'Now, old fellow,' I said aloud, 'suppose you begin at the beginning and give me the whole story as it ought to come.'

"'All right,' he replied, 'though it's not very definite and there is really little I can tell. It's more like something you have to feel.'

"'Five months ago I had a severe attack of the real blackwater fever. When I came out of it I was as weak as a cat. For a while I didn't think I could come out. But it happened that I did. I wish now I hadn't. I was a wreck. My nerves were bad at the time and I attributed it partly to them. The kernel of the story is that I thought I was being watched. Even when I slept, I'd wake up with a feeling that something was spying on me.

"'As I said, I thought it was my nerves, or maybe indigestion. Then the idea came to me that one of those niggers'—he waved his arm toward the lower end of the compound—'I got to thinkin' that maybe one of them had it in for me. They do that sometimes, you know.

"'With that idea in my head, I began packing a gun everywhere. I used to carry it only after dark or on a long trip. The fact is, I let my nerve slip so that I'd go to bed on my back with my arms folded to be able to grab this old cannon in a hurry. Even had my bed moved into the next room where I keep my big guns.

"'Well,' he continued after a pause, 'I finally convinced myself that I was suffering from some sort of hallucination; that the life up here without white companions had cracked me a little. It was then that the idea first struck me of getting shifted to another office, even at a lower salary, and I wrote my first letter to Frobisher.

"'For a while after that I managed to control myself and it seemed that the trouble had left me. I was even thinking, one night as I lay in bed, of cancelling my request for a transfer. But that very night, just as I was dropping off to sleep, I felt those eyes again, for the first time in—Oh—two or three weeks. The sensation was stronger than ever before. I could even feel the presence of another person in the room.

"'From then on life here was torture. While everything seemed all right in the presence of another person, even of one of the boys outside, when I knew that I was alone—or that I should be alone—I could then feel that someone or something was near me. I shall never be able to make you understand how I dreaded sunset. But after the sun had gone down, I dared not leave my cabin. And after I'd turn in at night! While I'd be lying in bed, this thing would move about the room.

"'I almost developed a crick in the neck from looking over my shoulder at every noise or shadow. That's my trouble, Flemming. Now can you blame me for wanting a transfer to another post? I sometimes believe it is my nerves, but when the dark comes I know it's something real. In either case, if I stay here, I'll go crazy. You know, I haven't even seen my wife for two years. What shall I do? There's nothing tangible to work on. It's just—everything's a hash. Maybe I am crazy right now, but the point is—What am I going to do?"

"The man looked so worn, sir, that I couldn't help feeling sorry for him; and by way of comforting the poor fellow, I suggested that he take a short trip up into the hills to one of the towns along the Assam border where he could see more of white men. At this there came into his eyes the same expression that I fancy must appear in those of a man just taken off the rack. He seemed not joyful or gay, for the strain upon him must have been too heavy to permit that, but he seemed at peace with himself, as though he had once more begun to live. 'I'll do that, boy,' he exclaimed. 'The Lord knows I feel as though it would do me good.'

"The next morning while having my first meal served in bed, Packer entered, not in his pajamas, but in full equipment for a trip, even down to corked boots and whipcord breeches; and his face was fairly gleaming.

"‘Mornin', Flemming,' he called quite heartily, 'I'm following your advice about that trip up country. You can take care of the post for about three weeks, can't you? There won't be much to do. By then I'll be in condition to stick it here until my transfer comes.'

"‘There won't be any new reports to run up, will there?' I asked. 'I can handle the business until you return. Behave yourself.'

"‘I'll do that.' And with a few last orders and explanations he left me and trotted, almost gaily, out to the gate where his boy awaited him with a cart. I watched him mount up beside the driver as the gate swung to behind them. A few minutes later they could be heard crossing the ford in the direction of Man-Koumbing.

"Of course I was delighted to see him go for his own sake, but his story had made more of an impression upon my mind than I had thought. In fact, I found myself so fidgety that until an hour afterward I felt inclined to send a runner asking him to return. Mr. Packer might be excused, in his illness, for believing such fantastic things, but why should I, just arrived and in perfect health, be so affected by his ghost stories? However, even as I put that question to myself, I sensed the answer. I was not well. It had been a hard trip up from Sringuna to the post and for one unused to the heat, it was a great drain upon the vitality. With this idea in mind, I called my boy and stated my intention of having a light meal immediately following my bath, and although feeling greatly refreshed by the combination of food and cold water—that is, water supposed to be cold—I nevertheless carried out my original intention of seeking my bed early in the evening. Incidentally I neglected Packer's advice concerning the gun.

"Near morning I was aroused by the oddest sensation conceivable. I am not psychic, but I most certainly could feel the presence of something in the room. Something I know was watching me. Even as I lay there, peering into the dark for a glimpse of my visitor, I could feel him or it moving about the room. Now all this tallied perfectly with Packer's story and, with icy perspiration trickling down my back, I sprang from the cot to see what the thing might be. But I found nothing. There was no trace of anyone having been in the room at all.

"Of course, after sunrise, I managed to persuade myself that it had been nothing but a nightmare, probably caused by too much sympathy for my superior. But when the performance was repeated at irregular intervals during the next two weeks, I began to appreciate the man's frame of mind. However, I was unable even then to reach a decision as to the real cause of these disturbances, for, even as a child, I would be frequently influenced so greatly by some wild tale that for weeks afterward my health would actually suffer.

"Although I used this old memory of my boyhood to bring myself back to my normal self, I was greatly relieved when Packer returned a week earlier than I had expected. I was hard at work in an attempt to quiet myself for a siesta when the low hum of insects outside my mosquito netting was drowned in a commotion among the natives which carried me back to reality from a half doze. The door opened and in walked Packer, even as I was moving toward the door.

" 'Hello there, old man,' I called, 'How was the trip? Have a good rest?' He scarcely grunted. 'Good Lord, fellow, you must be worn out,' I went on. 'Why didn't you take it easy instead of coming down through the heat? You look all done up.'

"Indeed the poor chap did look haggard, as if he hadn't been sleeping well. For a moment I suspected that he was suffering from sunstroke, so ghastly did he appear. But that fear was soon dispelled to make place for another. 'Flemming,' he said, 'I want to talk to you as soon as we're alone. Wait 'til I get Ho Sin up here to put away my luggage.'

"After a few minutes he returned and without so much as a 'thank you' draped himself across my cot, boots and all. At first he appeared ready to cry. Then, recovering himself, closed his eyes and addressed me. 'I don't need to tell you that my trip did me no good, Flemming,' he began.

" 'Well—maybe we were wrong,' I answered in an attempt to conceal what I fear would have shown in my face had he opened his eyes. 'Perhaps you needed a—'

"No, I don't mean that," he returned, "I mean that I'm worse off now than ever before. I can't even go home now because it will follow me. When I went up to Man-Koumbing I planned several parties and hunting trips, but most of all, I planned to escape this damned thing that watches me, hoped to leave it behind—lose it."

"And didn't you?" I asked.

"He paid no attention to me. 'I hoped to lose it,' he sobbed, 'but it followed me up into the hills and I didn't escape from it for a minute.'"

"But why don't you go home to your wife? You say you haven't seen her for two years. Just think, man, how glad she would be to see you."

"He did not reply."

"Why, while you were gone, your spook completely forgot to come after me," I lied. "I tell you your nerves are all shot and the tropics will be no place for you. Go home to England and see a good doctor. He can probably—"

"It's no use," he interrupted. "I will never shake this thing off, Flemming. I can't possibly go home to Helene; that would mean taking IT back to her." He buried his face in the pillow and I withdrew from the room as quietly as I could.

"And that night I was convinced beyond a doubt, although I would not admit it to Packer, that he suffered no more from nerves than I. For after at last sinking off into slumber I was aroused by the old sensation of being watched by something in the room. Automatically I reached for my gun and electric torch. But when I felt the latter in my hand, I hesitated to switch on the light. This thing in my room was moving slowly about, circling my bed. In horror I waited as it narrowed its circle toward me. Suddenly when it seemed that I could be driven into hysterics by sheer terror—my attention was drawn from my own plight by a scream from Packer's room, followed by the sound of bare feet padding down the hallway. It was then that I sent the beam of light through the darkness, catching Packer himself in the act of dashing into my room. 'What the devil?' I began, but he broke me off before I could finish. 'Flemming,' he gasped, 'It—something—God knows what it was—it was in my room. I felt it. It came and touched me on the forehead before I could cry out and drive it away.'

"A week later, I sat in my own cottage, to which I had recently moved, correcting a pile of surveyor's reports by the light of my midnight oil, when Packer entered the open door behind me. I arose with a start, and it would be putting it mildly to say that I was relieved upon recognizing him.

“‘Flemming,’ he began, ‘my transfer is here at last. Came in today’s mail. Frobisher says that while there’s no place for me back home, he can shift me to a desk somewhere in India, Simla, perhaps.’

“‘Great,’ I replied. ‘Now that you are going back where you can see a few white men, I know that you’ll be able to shake your—’ Here my eye fell upon the desk, upon the spot where I had laid my pen across the margin of a page of records. ‘Packer, look here! This is where I put that pen. Now look at it.’ It lay upon the upper part of the desk and we both knew that pens never roll all the way up a drawing board.

“Although I had not intended to alarm the chap at the very time he needed peace—before returning to some sort of civilization—nevertheless, the exclamation had been forced from me by sheer surprise—surprise and fear. For I remember quite clearly where I had placed the pen as I arose to congratulate him, but upon looking down, purely by accident, I saw that it had been moved. At the same time, the feeling came over me that in the room with us was some third being. Yet nothing was to be seen. For some time we both remained frozen in our places. Then Packer dropped into a chair, trembling violently, his head bowed; and, although I have seen animals bristle and have heard of hair standing on end, this was the first time I saw it happen to a man. Not a breath of air was stirring, but I could see the short hairs along the back of his neck move slightly and begin to elevate themselves. I suddenly realized that the perspiration was falling in little drops from my left hand, and already a spot on the floor looked as if someone had spilt water there, a good deal of it, too.

“At last the fellow’s hand sought for something under his vest. ‘Flemming,’ he whispered—I was alarmed at the tone of his voice, so flat and hollow, ‘Flemming, I was in such a hurry to get here that I left my gun at home. Can you lend me one of yours? I’m packing up tonight and I’ll advise you to do the same.’

“With an effort, I managed to shake my head.

“Suit yourself then, boy. But by morning, Leon Packer will be as far from this damn place as he can get.

“‘You know, Clyde, I don’t mind admitting that I’m afraid to cross that thirty or forty feet to my own cabin in the dark.’

“As he moved toward the door, I handed him my little 25-40 rifle from its rack. Then, upon reaching the doorway, he brandished the rifle, and, I think more to bolster up his own courage, than to convey any idea to me, he babbled: ‘I’m using this on anything that gets in my way tonight. By tomorrow night—’ At this point, something—I cannot tell what it was,—but something forced me to turn my head sharply. Behind me I saw the familiar walls and furnishings, nothing more. A man's nerves do sometimes play tricks, but never had I been tricked in that manner. Or was I tricked? Could there have been something there? I was certain that there was an hostile presence in the room.

"Then—'Odd,' I thought, 'Very odd that Packer should have left so abruptly.' I turned my eyes toward the door. It was open, as usual, but the mosquito netting over it was still, not shaking as it would had someone brushed against it to leave. But he was gone! No one can understand the full meaning of the word 'horror' until he has felt it as I felt it then. Packer had not of his own accord left the room as a material body or he would have disturbed the netting in some way. Nor had anything been able to take him through that doorway. But he was gone!"

Flemming's letter continues in an apology for not fulfilling his position at Vombool, and for his refusal to disclose his whereabouts. But the subsequent resignations of his successors may perhaps bear him out in his excuses for such an abrupt refusal to continue in the employ of this company.

The Wiser Choice

BEING a brain specialist, I am naturally interested in every human type. Many a story lies hidden underneath an ordinary manner of living and it has been one of my greatest joys to ferret out these histories and do what I can to help the afflicted one.

My interest had been aroused for some time by a young man, a plumber by name, who was surprisingly named "Coppersmith". The consistency of name with trade, and the young man himself were a puzzle to me. My first experience with him had been at my home when our water pipes had burst. His conscientious attitude toward his work made me investigate and I found that he was most ambitious, studying at night and making money to become a doctor. That he should have chosen the occupation of a plumber, having no connection at all with medicine, his interest in my own profession, and his undoubted worth, all three incited me to further investigation.

One day, when he was called in for a little matter of pipes again, I purposely stayed in the room with him. Under cover of a book, I studied him at work. I noticed him straighten up once or twice with a puzzled expression, and then, glancing at me, resume his labor.

Suddenly I spoke to him, "John, it's rather singular your having the name of Coppersmith. Was your father a plumber?" He appeared startled by the question but finally replied—much to my amazement—“I’ll tell you, Dr. Williams, I chose that name for myself because I could think of no other more suitable.”

“What do you mean?” I asked, startled, but delighted to find my apprehensions true.

“Yes, indeed, my dear boy—go right ahead.”

“Where I was born,” he began, “how old I am, and what my name is—I don’t know. I seem to have lost all memory of my past. About three years ago, down on the sea coast there was a terrific storm. Some fisherman, looking for wreckage along the shore, found me. They thought I was drowned but I revived and began a new life, for I could remember nothing of what I had been. For a year, I lived with them trying to regain my past, but finally came here to the city to study medicine. The only job I could get at first was as a plumber’s assistant, so I have stayed with him while working my way through night school.”

“But can’t you remember just one little thing for a clue to your past life?” I questioned.

He closed his eyes and tried to concentrate. “Only—a—sort of,” he struggled for words—“all I can see is a thick darkness—and water—and I seem to be struggling against something vague and terrible. It’s all very hazy and probably is nothing but a dream I had when I was drowning.”

I pondered this a few moments and then asked, “Why did you choose to become a doctor?”

“It sounds strange, doctor, but it is a desire that I can’t smother, I am only happy when I think of myself as a doctor—helping people to health and happiness. Perhaps before I lost my memory I was a doctor—or wished to be one—I don’t know.”

We became great friends and I helped the boy in his studying. Finally, I persuaded him to allow me to operate and see if I could regain his past for him. As I have said, I am a brain specialist and enjoy quite a reputation for my operations in medical circles. This is to explain my apparent egotism in hoping to cure such a hopeless case.

John Coppersmith is a brave man, and he placed himself entirely in my charge. I secured for him, my best nurse, and, after weeks of planning, I undertook the operation. The nurse, Miss Bradley, was with him day and night to note his every motion. The first two days he was unconscious, but on the third night as Miss Bradley’s record shows, John began to mutter incoherently. The next day the mumbling became plainer. The nurse and I listened all afternoon to his cries. We grew horrified at what we heard. John writhed in agony, but it appeared to be agony of the soul rather than of the body. At times he screamed and became so violent that we moved him to an isolated room. All night we listened, and from the broken sentences gathered his story—and such a story! Our John Coppersmith, the plumber, the would-be doctor, the highly-esteemed young man, was a murderer! It seemed that he had been alone in the world, living with friends, when by a horrible carelessness on his part the little son of the family was killed. Perhaps his desire to be a doctor had sprung from the moments of torture he lived through while the child was dying. At any rate, he had run away and seemed to have lost his memory from the terrible anguish he went through. Was it right to bring our dearly loved friend back to a life of useless self-reproach and misery?

Miss Bradley and I looked at each other over his trembling body.

John was with me at dinner tonight. He is my right hand man now and I couldn't get along without him.

"You know," he said to me, "sometimes I am glad your operation was not successful, doctor. I might have been a pauper, I might have been a thief, and yet, I might have been a king's son, who knows?"

Pablo

JUST another immigrant—just one in the throngs of excited, steaming masses of humanity that pour from the ship's steerage into our land of opportunity. Pablo, a dreamy-eyed, wistful boy, was all alone. Back there in sunny Spain, just two short months ago he had laid his mother and father to their last rest, and now here he was, bewildered and frightened, in the midst of New York's teeming life.

Clinging tightly to his little bundle of clothing, he ventured into the confusion of traffic. A sound of shrieking brakes, a pitiful cry,—and Pablo's beautiful nineteen years were stretched on the ground. His dreamy eyes were closed and above the right one an ugly gash was streaming crimson blood across his brow to form a tiny puddle under his temple. Quickly an adventure-seeking, excitement-craving crowd gathered closely, completely stopping traffic. Above the tooting of the horns, the throbbing of engines, the shrill cries of women, the whistles of frantic policemen trying to clear way for traffic, piercing the very unconsciousness of the prostrate boy rose a sullen, angry voice.

"These dirty immigrants! Why in the name of — can't they stay where they belong?"

Hurt darkness fell upon the boy.

Pablo stirred uneasily, arousing sharp pains in his right arm, which made the perspiration break out in great beads upon his forehead. A groan of utter misery and pain broke through his lips. Consciousness with its intense suffering was returning. Instantly a tender hand was placed upon the bandage of the injured arm and a sweet, soothing voice calmed him. With an almost superhuman effort, Pablo opened his eyes. Through the haze he had a dim vision of red, red lips to which his eyes remained glued. Then these lips opened. Oh, the pearly whiteness of those teeth. They fascinated the beauty-starved boy. "Drink this," tinkled a silver voice. "And then go to sleep like a good boy."

Obediently as a little child the immigrant drank the liquid placed to his lips, still gazing raptly at that flower-like mouth.

So it was that Pablo met Marian. Nor did he ever recover from his adoration for those lips. Certainly he was not blind to the darling little nose, the gorgeous blue eyes, nor the rippling waves of golden hair. But always did Marian's lips haunt him.

Every day of those many days that Pablo spent in the Charity Ward of that great hospital, Marian came and spent a few minutes with him when her duties were a little less urgent. Perhaps the humble adoring gleam in those wistful eyes called forth an answering friendliness from the girl. Certainly, she had never before given so much thought to an immigrant in the Charity Ward. But as she said to Armand, he was such a "beautiful boy".

Armand, however, failed to see that. In his mind his fiancée had only one fault—that of being too interested in immigrants. And he said so. It brought on a quarrel. Foolish perhaps, but then all life is foolish in a way.

"I can't understand, Armand," Marian said, in an icy tone, "what right you have to condemn my views. You are narrow-minded and can't, or won't, see both sides to any question. Under the circumstances, I believe I had better break off the engagement. Here is your ring." Armand's face went suddenly white. "Marian—please—" he faltered, holding out his hand appealingly. "Let's never mention this question again."

Steadfastly, Marian held to her decision. "When you can come to me," she said, "and honestly tell me that you have a likable interest in our country's immigrants, I'll try to accept you again."

So Armand went his way, and Marian went back to her work.

The day Pablo was to be discharged, he found Marian crying. Upon hearing a halting explanation, Pablo's eyes flashed and he resolved to do all in his power to keep Marian's lips from turning down at the corners—those adorable lips made for smiles, for cheerful words, for kisses—

Pablo walked slowly down the steps of the hospital, leaving behind him the only friend he had in New York. Penniless, homeless, jobless, a poor wanderer with no definite purpose except to make Marian's lips smile. Oh, his head hurt. That gash, though healed, brought a different kind of pain, a forgetfulness of everything but Marian's lips—those lips which were the first thing he had seen of beauty in this new country.

Suddenly he heard a voice behind him talking—talking. That voice! Now he remembered! Just as he had lapsed into unconsciousness that day he had heard that voice. It had said,—let's see—yes, it had said, "These dirty immigrants! Why, in the name of ——— can't they stay where they belong?"

The poor befuddled mind of the boy caused him to turn and stare at the man with the voice. Such a young man, so strong and handsome, but for that look part sorrow, part hate, and part something else. How could Pablo know that that something else was a love which urged him to overcome the hate? This man was talking to a much older man who seemed to be arguing with him about immigrants, Pablo thought.

Instinctively, Pablo crossed the street after them. Right in the middle of the thoroughfare, so intense was their argument, the two men paused for just a split second, but that was enough for a speeding limousine to come within a very few feet of them. Uttering a shrill, horrified scream, Pablo darted forward, and pushed the two men with all his might, sending them stumbling out of the way. But poor Pablo! Cruel America with its monster, Traffic! In his last thoughts Pablo saw Marian's lips smiling, though sad, and somehow, God knows how, he knew it was because of his act that day that she smiled. And the grateful and humbled Armand understood.

Michael Cordella

It was an afternoon such as only Italy can offer. The sun was just warm enough; a slight breeze stirred the leaves in a kind of a happy, drowsy way. It was a beautiful garden with a high stone wall all about it. There were many trees in this garden—tall, stately trees; there were bright colored flowers in abundance. But, for all the beauty of the garden, the most interesting thing was not the garden nor the lovely old marble sun dial, nor the beautiful statuary around the huge garden, but a boy, bending over some white marble. His hair was a dark brown mass of curls; his skin had been tanned by the sun. Michael's curls fell softly about his face as he leaned over the fawn he was finishing. His chisel was here, then there as he chipped away a little marble that shouldn't have been there. Michael's face was flushed with great excitement and delight. This was truly the best thing that Michael Cordella had ever made. In a little while Michael's master, the kind Signor Modessa, came into this garden.

"Do you not see now?" he said, "It is as I have often said, 'whatever Michael Cordella purposes in his heart to do, that he cannot fail to do'."

"Ah yes," said Michael thoughtfully, "it is very true, whatever Michael Cordella purposes in his heart to do, that he cannot fail to do."

One day, while Michael was working in this garden a messenger came from the king. Michael ran to get Signor Modessa, but the messenger said that he had come to see Michael Cordella, not Signor Modessa. The messenger said that the king wished to see him, for he had heard of him as the boy, the wonderful sculptor, Michael Cordella. He said that the king had business to communicate with him. Now Michael was just a tiny bit frightened, but he remembered what Signor Modessa had told him, "Whatever Michael Cordella purposes in his heart to do, that he cannot fail to do."

The next morning early, Michael started out with the messenger to go to the king. It was not far, and by afternoon their journey was completed.

When Michael entered the room in which the king was sitting, his knees shook, and he bowed very low.

"Michael Cordella?" said a kind voice.

"Yes, your royal majesty," came a faint reply.

"Come over here, and do not be frightened. I have heard that you paint very well, but that your work with marble surpasses everybody's.

I want a very beautiful monument erected to me, and you are the one I have chosen to design and carve it for me."

"Oh, I'm still quite young, your majesty; I'm sure that there are more wonderful sculptors than I." "Yet," he thought, "What Michael Cordella purposes in his heart to do, that he cannot fail to do."

"Oh, I'd love to try," he said finally. "I'd do my very best, and you could come each day and make suggestions!"

"All right, my son," said the king, then turning to a servant he continued, "Show him his rooms, the garden in which he is to work, give him his tools and see that nothing is spared."

Michael Cordella was very happy. He planned and planned, and every day he spent in the garden working on his monument. Often he felt discouraged, but always he remembered that whatever Michael Cordella purposed in his heart to do, that he could not fail to do, so he would work on. Often, the king came to see his work, and he was very pleased with it.

One day, when the monument was about three-fourths done, the king again sent for Michael Cordella. This time, the king looked very sad, and a little bit angry.

"I have decided not to have a monument at all. Instead I want you to paint pictures in the dome of St. Mary's Chapel." The king went on and on, but Michael could not hear! He could not understand! He had painted some, to be sure, but he had always loved to chisel lovely things out of marble so very much more. At last he heard the king say something about scaffolding being put up and the chapel closed. Michael was to begin work in the morning.

It was with a sad heart and slow steps that Michael went to his room. Not to work in the garden again. Not to finish the lovely monument! Oh, oh, it could not be true.

Michael painted and painted. He had one part nearly finished, and as he was going home to his rooms one night months after he had left the garden and monument and his chisel, he felt rain in his face. At first the king had come to see him many times, but now he hardly ever came. It was raining hard, but Michael could not hurry. Each day he spent lying on his back on the scaffolding, painting, painting, painting. Once in a while paint would drop in his eyes and he could not see. The rain was beating down, harder each minute. When at last he got to his room the rain was coming down in torrents.

The next morning the rain had lessened, and Michael hurried to his work. When he reached the chapel he started up, up, up, but he had not gotten very far when he looked up, and to his bitter dismay, the work of these past months was ruined!

Oh, the miserable rain! In one night it had ruined pictures, wonderful mural paintings, that it had taken Michael months to paint!

Michael was so downcast he could hardly move. After a long time, Michael knew not how long, he suddenly realized that he had not moved since he had seen the destruction. Slowly he climbed the stairs. The rain had ruined his pictures! The king had not come to see them. He was tired, his eyes hurt, but he remembered that what Michael Cordella purposed in his heart to do, that he could not fail to do.

For many days Michael did not return to the chapel. He stayed in his room mixing paints and trying all combinations. How could he fix them so rain would not hurt them? At last, after weeks of struggling he found a combination that water had no affect on.

Again he started climbing the stairs of the scaffolding; again, all day he lay on his back, painting, painting, painting. Michael was lonely. He always seemed tired. His skin, once so tan and beautiful, was pale and wrinkled. His hair, once lovely brown curls, was now white and ugly. He had no time for himself—only for his pictures.

All day as he lay on his back, reaching up with his arms, he would paint, but the work seemed so slow, his arms got so tired, always reaching upward, and his eyes would smart so for sometimes paint would get in them.

"Oh," he thought, "if someone would only come to see the paintings, or if I could tell the king I could not work more; but then, what would Senor Modessa say, for "What Michael Cordella purposes in his heart, that he cannot fail to do." Yet what was the use—it was so long ago that the king had probably forgotten him—Senor Modessa had died—and Michael felt alone in the world. He worked on and on. The days, the weeks, the months dragged slowly by. The months turned into years, and Michael Cordella, a man now, painted on. Michael was ageing rapidly but no matter—it was just that much less time to be lonely. Each day, as he slowly climbed the stairs he wondered if anyone would ever know—he would not tell anyone—perhaps it were best that the world didn't know the suffering of this lonely man.

After years and years Michael's work was done, but he was nearly blind. His clothes were ragged, for after a few years the king stopped sending him money. Michael wondered if the king remembered him after so many years, for Michael had been young when he had started. But now, he was an old man, with faded eyes, ugly unkept hair, and a pale and haggard face.

Finally Michael sought admission at the palace where he had been forgotten by everyone.

"Michael Cordella—Michael Cordella," the king said to himself musingly—"Oh yes, I remember now. Well, old man, so you have finished your work? Well, tell someone to take down the scaffolding and the sign that said 'Closed for new decorating' and get a priest to have services there in the morning. You are dismissed."

No word of praise! No word of thanks, no promise of a visit! Nothing!

Michael obeyed and the next week the chapel was again opened to the people.

As Michael Cordella sat near the door, he heard people enter; they said, "Well, I can't see any new decorating. I think the place needs painting!"

Nothing else! Poor Michael's heart sank. But two old men had seen the paintings as they were leaving.

"Oh, what beautiful paintings," one of them said. The other went on—"All the colors are wonderful, but the red is the most beautiful!"

"Yes," thought Michael, "the red is beautiful, but what a price!"

Not long afterward Michael Cordella died—but what difference did it make? No one missed him.

He had a huge scar on his chest. No one knew how it had come there, for Michael had never revealed any of his secrets—but he did have beautiful reds!

"Shelly! Oh Little Shelly! It is time for you to get up, if you expect to get that story written for English."

"Yes'm—but gee, I'm sleepy!"

"Well, get up or you won't have your story done in time for school and you know what Miss Benson will say if you don't hand it in on time!"

"Whatever Little Shelly purposes in her heart to do, Mother, that she cannot fail to do."

The Long White Robe

ON May 24, 1431, Joan of Arc signed publicly her abjuration, a document which bound her to assume woman's dress and remain in the prison of Rouen the rest of her life. The wife and daughter of the warden, a man named Chapelle, were sent that afternoon to make her the long white robe which she was to wear instead of her military uniform.

Madame Chapelle and her daughter, Catherine, went loaded with bolts of cloth to the prison where they found Joan's cell guarded by several villianous-looking English soldiers whom Madame Chapelle dismissed with an air of authority, though she was really terrified by the very sight of them. To her great relief they obeyed her and went away, after letting them into the room.

While they were going through the door Madame Chapelle whispered to her daughter, a fair young girl of eighteen, "I hear that this Joan is a very wicked and outspoken wench. Promise me, Catherine, that you will pay no attention to the dreadful things she may say or do."

Catherine solemnly promised, and entered the cell. Madame Chapelle could see nothing for a moment, due to the chilly darkness in the little room. Presently her eyes become accustomed to it, and she perceived a figure sitting on the narrow cot in a corner.

After the first surprised glance at Joan of Arc, Madame Chapelle's prejudices were swiftly undermined. She had expected to see an ugly, rough-looking woman, with an "evil eye" and bold manners. Instead there was a thin, drooping figure, wasted from its original sturdiness by long imprisonment. There were traces of a girlish beauty in the pale face with its sad eyes; beauty in the lips which were once full and smiling, with traces of courageous curves.

The three women exchanged greetings, Joan speaking very sweetly and almost bashfully. Catherine lighted a candle which she had brought from home—prisoners were never given candles. Her mother swiftly unrolled a bolt of coarse white linen, while she asked, "Will you please stand up mademoiselle, so that I can take your measurements?"

The Maid of Orleans smiled and replied, "Look closer, and you will see why I can neither stand nor walk."

Catherine seized her candle and held it so it threw its feeble light upon Joan, and so she saw what she had not noticed before, for a band of iron was locked about Joan's waist, and five chains of varying length were fastened to it. One of these chains was riveted to a ring in a bed-post; the others confined Joan's feet and hands. Catherine was horrified, and lowered her candle so hastily that the flame was blown out, as though fire itself could not bear the sight of a human being worn to death by other human beings.

"Good heavens!" cried the girl. "How could they do that to you, a girl, and helpless? How can you endure the weight of them? Are they never unfastened?"

"Sometimes. At night another chain is added, which ties me to the bed, so that I cannot rise up from lying down. You remember that I escaped once from a prison, and that is why I must wear these," said Joan, in a low, weary voice.

Madame Chapelle's intensely practiced nature asserted itself here and she demanded, "Why, how can we make you a dress without having your measurements?"

Joan laughed—it was so strange to think that she could laugh! and suggested, "Your daughter is nearly my size, though I am taller and thinner than she. Can't you judge from that?"

Catherine drew a long breath to drive away the dull sadness that had filled her heart. She stood up, was measured, and Madame Chapelle made a few reckless slashes in her bolt of cloth. In a little while the pieces were ready to be sewed together, whereupon Catherine perched herself upon the bed by Joan, in an impulsive desire to show her pity, if only by being near her.

"I like to sew," murmured the Maid of Orleans, "I used to be called an excellent seamstress, but I haven't had a needle in my hand for three years or more. May I not hem the skirt?"

A needle was instantly handed to her, and she used it with evident pleasure, humming a little song that she had sung with the children of Domrémy. She was at once raised a thousand times in Madame Chapelle's estimation, who always trusted a woman who liked to sew.

Thus the afternoon passed away. Joan had not conversed with women so long that she was eager to chat with her visitors. She told them of her childhood in Domrémy, of the beloved saints who had appeared to her, of her long journey to the Dauphin, of her campaigns, of her capture, of her trials. She spoke cheerfully, but when she was finished she sat bowed down, her face filled with agony. Catherine timidly seized her hand and kissed it, feeling that to be kind to Joan was the finest thing she or anyone could do.

Presently the soldiers returned and the Chapelles were forced to go, taking the gown with them to finish. Next day, Monsieur Chapelle left it in Joan's cell and she put it on, thus giving the final signs of resignation to the church.

On May 27, Catherine Chapelle went early in the morning to visit Joan, which she had permission to do, since her father was the warden. She found all but one of the soldiers gone. He admitted her into the cell. She saw Joan sitting in her former place on the bed. And, strangest of all strange things, the dress which had been made for her lay in a heap on the floor, and the girl wore her masculine attire again. Catherine took one faltering step toward her, then leaned trembling against the wall.

"Joan of Arc," she gasped, "do you understand what you have done?"

Joan lifted her face, and Catherine saw how calm and fearless it was.

"Yes; I understand what I have done."

"But, Joan, it is a relapse—you have broken your word to the judges—they will punish you sorely, Joan."

"I know they will."

Catherine ran to kneel by her side, and clasped her hands about her waist.

"My friend, my sister," she pleaded, "do what I ask you to do—put on the dress. For your life's sake, I ask it! I ask it for my own sake, for I loved you from the moment I first saw you. You don't understand. Joan, they will kill you!"

"I know it. Catherine, don't cry; don't kneel to me," and Joan lifted her up onto the cot.

"I can't bear it, Joan! When they find it out they will kill you."

"They know it already, Catherine. They will call me soon to the court. The other soldiers have gone to tell Cauchon what I have done."

Catherine looked at her for one long moment, then shuddered and sat very still, overwhelmed by the thought of what would follow.

"And, Catherine," continued Joan, "when I think of what I signed in the abjuration I wish I had done this long before. I swore that my Visions were false—and behold! they came and rebuked me! I bound myself to stay in prison until I die, and death is the only relief I can have, so why not die soon? I do not regret it, so why should you?"

Catherine let her eyes wander over the bare dismal cell, and realized that she too would have died rather than remain in such a place. She dropped her face into her hand and began to cry, softly and fearfully. A moment afterwards the door swung open and a guard of soldiers entered.

"Joan of Arc, called the Maid of Orleans, you are summoned to court."

The chain that bound her to the bed was unlocked, though the others remained at her wrists and feet. Joan arose and embraced Catherine, whispering meanwhile:

"I know that the sentence will be—ah, farewell, and remember that I am neither frightened nor regretful."

Then she went out, limping a little under the weight of the irons. Catherine dropped to her knees and tried to pray, but her thoughts were in a turmoil. She arose and found her way out into the street in the hot May sun, her eyes blind with tears. Four days afterward the Maid of Orleans was gone. She wore the long white robe at the stake.

Two Figures

AS I gaze listlessly out of the second floor window, the tall building on the next block grows dim and in its place stands a snow-covered mountain. At the summit is a figure—tall, straight and beautiful, glorying in its wonders of the world, basking in success. At the foot of the mountain is a strong figure, bent with the struggle; the struggle to arise to the heights which have already been attained by the other figure. His breath comes in gasps. Now and then he rests a second and dreams; then he resumes his climb. The way is hard, and steep; and he slips at every other step. Yet on he climbs, never ceasing in his ambitious struggle. Ah, at last! Half way! There just ahead looms a gigantic boulder. He clutches at it, gets a foothold, slips, pulls back up and finally masters it; and though he is torn and bleeding, he lifts his face toward the summit with a still greater eagerness. The prize is getting nearer.

As the struggler climbs, the other figure grows tired of the work of holding to the summit. Slowly at first, the speed gradually increasing, he slides down from his Glory. He has reached the struggler; he clutches for just a moment inspired by him, then continues on his downward path with warnings not to go further. But the prize is too close—on and on climbs the struggler. At the last boulder he pauses, draws a deep breath and that breath is so invigorating that the highest boulder of all is but a small stone. Once over it and then success.

But unlike the former occupant, he reaches out, straightens and grows stronger. He retains his hold, grows doubly glorified and makes room for another. And perhaps the next one reaches it and the next fails. But that is—life.

The Suitors of Julie

Y name is Jean Rigauche. I am married and have six children, all of which happiness I owe to the Reign of Terror.

Ten years ago I was an unsuccessful suitor of the beautiful Julie Bernard. I had grown up with Mademoiselle Julie; had baked mud pies with her; had played, worked, and studied with her, so I naturally thought I had some claim to her affection. Besides I had an excellent position as keeper of the inn, which came to me through the death of my father. But Julie was rather poor, as she did plain sewing to eke out her small inheritance, in order to support herself and the old aunt who was her only living relation.

One day in May, 1789, I went to the little house where Julie lived, and made her sit down in her parlor and listen to me. I do not remember what I said, but I was miserably embarrassed. After she had heard me, Julie looked at me queerly, and said,

"Marry you? Why—why, Jean, I can't! In fact I have the honor of inviting you to witness my wedding to Robert Dupin in August!"

I was stunned by this somewhat brusque refusal. I said nothing more. I went silently away and brooded over it.

After all, why should Julie Bernard prefer me to Robert? Robert is handsome—I am not. Robert has quick wit and graceful speech—I am rather dull. Robert has small feet and delicate hands—they tell me that I should not waste shoe leather on my big feet. They tell me that I need gloves cut from full-sized sails! Robert follows a gentleman's calling; he is a lawyer. I am a mere inn-keeper. But I am well situated in the world, and Robert is a poor student. (And in those days before the Revolution the poor had no help; they could only starve with patience.) I could at least support her! So I determined not to give up hope.

Robert Dupin went to Paris to study law at the university. He wrote to Julie frequently, she has told me, but sometimes his letters were opened and destroyed by the guards.

For in that year the French Revolution was drawing its first breath. We, in the country and small villages, were somewhat lax in interest at first, though goodness knows we suffered enough from tyranny! But in the cities, Paris and Orleans especially, the Revolutionary faction was gaining sway. However, few even dreamed of the approach of the upheaval which a few peasants and a few philosophers had begun.

Early in July we received news in our village that the common people of Paris had attacked the Bastille, gained control of the city, and had the king and queen penned up in the summer palace of Versailles.

Then all communication was cut off and we heard nothing more. Julie was anxious for Robert's safety, for his great-grandsire had been a count, and what might that not prove in the eyes of the Revolutionists? However, I worried not at all; the fact that we got no more letters from Robert Dupin only added to my feeling of satisfaction. I again proposed to Julie, but I received a murderous blow from her thimble, and she burst into tears, calling me "a brute".

Unwillingly, I helped to capture a frightened Marquis, who was trying to flee to Spain. A guillotine was manufactured out of broken parts of a coach, and set up in the square. A favorite diversion (though not to me nor to Julie) was to watch the knife as it rose and fell, never rusty, but frequently streaked with blood. It rather sickened me. Julie had a dreadful horror of the executioner; she shuddered when she saw him, she avoided the square, and fainted at the mention of death.

Finally, in September, Julie determined to try to save her lover. She wheedled the magistrate to write her a pass of admission into and out of Paris. She also made him manufacture one for Robert.

"But," said her old aunt, "who will go with you, Julie? You can't go alone!"

And Julie replied, "Who, indeed, but my good brother Jean?"

So I, unable to refuse, got myself a pass, hired a coach, and set off early one chilly morning with her.

Imagine my feelings when I set out upon this mission to save my rival in love!

After a journey of five hours, we arrived at Paris and were admitted. We were forced to leave our coach at the gate, as the driver refused to go on. I suppose he had visions of streets swimming in blood, and full of demons who jumped out and devoured innocent passers-by.

Julie had the address of the inn where Robert stayed. It was two blocks from the Bastille. So we set out on foot. We went through many long, narrow streets, almost empty of pedestrians. But at nearly every street corner there was a large group of men and women talking in loud voices, and of these I asked the way. I was very careful to address none as Master or Mistress, but always as Citizen or Citizeness.

It was a long, long walk, past poorly thatched old houses and almost empty shops. Julie grew tired but would not stop and rest, so I made her hold to my arm and thus half dragged her along. We were silent. I was praying and praying that some awful calamity had destroyed Robert Dupin, and Julie was praying against my prayer.

Just as we entered a particularly narrow street, we heard a great rumbling and shouting approaching us. We looked back, and there, from the streets and houses at both sides and from the street behind us a great multitude came screaming and running over the rough cobble-

In a moment they were surrounding us, and we were helplessly swept along. I thanked Heaven for my big feet and hands, which made excellent weapons to ward off those who would otherwise have jostled Julie.

In a moment the whole company had arrived at the public square to which the street led. Julie and I were wedged in between a fat butcher and the wall of a house. By craning our necks we could see ahead a tall scaffold—the Guillotine—and could hear the rumbling approach of a tumbril.

Julie turned pale when she realized she was to witness an execution. In the roar of the crowd I could barely hear her whisper:

“Oh, suppose Robert should die thus!”

The clumsy wagon which held the prisoners arrived, drawn by two oxen. By lifting myself on my toes I could see the victims, and reluctantly assured Julie that the hated Robert was unfortunately not among them!

One of the prisoners, an old man in faded silk and velvet, was dragged up the ladder to the top of the high scaffold. The guards made him lie down on the platform directly under the knife poised above, and bound him thus so he could not move.

Then we heard a great cry:

“The executioner! Here is our good surgeon! our good barber!”

Julie shut her eyes with a groan. I saw a tall young man, with a red kerchief on his head, run up the ladder and stand triumphantly on the scaffold, amidst great applause. He turned slowly around and commenced his task. I saw his face—and I gasped with amazement.

“Julie!” I cried. “Look up there!”

Poor Julie mournfully raised her eyes and gazed into the smiling face of Robert Dupin, “the good executioner”. She promptly began to cry. I hope Robert saw her then.

I managed somehow to elbow our way out of the mob and we retraced our steps down the narrow streets, with the bloodthirsty shouts sounding in our ears. All the long way to the gate I heard Julie say, over and over, “Oh, the beast! Oh, the traitor! I can’t marry a murderer! No wonder he didn’t write to me. Oh, how I hate him!”

We got home late in the night. I left Julie at her door and went home chuckling with joy.

Two days afterward I married Julie.

The Thing We Call Life

It was no use. He had tried, oh, so hard to catch a firm grip on life again. But he had lost his self-confidence, that necessary essence of manhood. He might as well admit it, bitter as it was. The war had ruined him, shattered him and left him the poor hollow thing that he was. War, that awful reminder of the eternal fire of punishment, was responsible.

David Maitland was no coward, no weakling to give up life, and hope, and love without an earnest struggle, but the odds were disastrously against him. He had enlisted in the war when he was twenty; a fine, eager boy on life's threshold, determined to wrest peace from the shell-racked ruin of Europe. He had given, and given much. Not the supreme sacrifice, as people are wont to call it, but something infinitely more dear to him—his youth and his hope. He was blind; incredible thought! Blind at twenty-five; old, hopeless and helpless.

In the hospital training school he had learned to typewrite. They said he would make a fine secretary. His long, slender fingers, used to the touch of the keys of a piano, were oddly adapted to the keys of a typewriter. He had had five positions now and given them all up. He had feared that it was charity, pity, that had gained him his positions, instead of real worth.

"What are you going to do, David?" his doctor had asked. What was he going to do?

"Oh, God, let me die," he breathed. He was a burden on a pitying world. No good, no use, just excess. A burden. What shame!

"O, David, there was a call for you today. Lady coming to see you tomorrow. Wants you as secretary and right-hand man for her niece, who is music critic and reviewer on the World."

Another offer of charity. Charity! He hated the word.

Next day Mrs. Morrow came to see him. She explained that Delight Morrow, her niece, needed a right hand man to help her with reviews. "She is quite snowed in under work, poor child," said Mrs. Morrow. "She is young, good natured, irresistibly gay, and a good employer. You'll come, won't you, Mr. Maitland?"

"Come?" Yes, he'd come. He had to support himself, charity or no charity. Some frivolous young woman with a superiority complex, he supposed. But to hear good music again—. His throat muscles tightened.

"Yes, I'll come," he said aloud.

"Good, the car will call for you at nine, Mr. Maitland. Delight is anxious to meet you. Good-day."

Next day he met Delight. What a name! he mused. Of course it didn't fit her. It couldn't! No female was exquisite enough to be called Delight. It was music. So was her voice, he found out.

"Has he come, Auntie mine?" a gay young voice called from the corner of the room before him. "Yes, dear. Here he is. Mr. Maitland, my niece, Delight Morrow."

Introduction over. It hadn't been awkward. Delight's husky, silver-fine voice had soothed him, comforted him, made him feel at home, welcome, even wanted.

And so a month passed without a discord. A harmony existed between them unmarred by the friendly disputes of the merits of renowned composers. And best of all, he had a piano to hear, to soothe the ache in his heart, to promise, to woo him to a semblance of happiness. The ache had more than one cause now. Delight was one cause. The month was nearly over and another position was to be thrown away. What then? What did it matter?

And then one day sitting in the music room, he had felt the irresistible urge to feel the piano keys under his hot fingers. Gropingly, he felt for the piano, found it, seated himself. And then a few hesitating, fumbling chords; then he hadn't forgotten how!

"Notes of linkéd sweetness long drawn out."

All the anguish, the heartache, the dread, the fear, and his glorious blind love for Delight rushed to his fingers, poured over the keys, tumbled into melody. Then a sudden, jarring discord.

Hopelessness, lifelessness overwhelmed him. Realization swept over him. "Poor blind fool," he gasped bitterly.

"David!" Delight was beside him, had seated herself beside him, her breath warm on his cheek, her hand on his arm. "David, you didn't tell me you could. Oh, David, what a secret!"

"Delight, didn't you understand, didn't my music tell you? Wasn't it—Oh, God, I love you, worship you, blind idiot that I am. That's my secret! Only mine and now yours because I've—oh, what have I done?"

He rose, stumbled against a lamp, hurriedly rushed for the door, knocking into things.

"David, David, come back. Please, oh, please, David! Where are you? Oh, I can't find you! Come to me, David." She bumped into a chair, knocked it over and fell heavily to the floor.

"Delight, where are you? What happened, child?" He had her in his arms, holding her gently, feeling her face with tender finger-tips.

"David," she sobbed, "that's my secret. I was born without light. Don't you see we belong to each other? We shall hear the beauties of life together, dear. Will you be mine, David?"

On the Rifle Range

ALL out," shouted a sergeant, as he stepped in front of one of the tents of A Company.

"Hurry up, Parker, you're late as usual," he added to a head that was half covered by a woolen army blanket.

"Aw, can't you 'non-coms' let a guy rest a mintue? I came to this camp to have some fun, and here I find nothing but a crowd of 'N. C. O.'s' without anything to do but drag us out of bed at a quarter-to-six every morning. They work you to death at these Citizens' Military Training Camps."

Grumbling and heaping abuses upon the officers and the entire army in general, Cadet J. Bradleigh Parker Jr., the only son of Mr. J. Bradleigh Parker Sr., the richest man in Parkersville, began fumbling with his uniform, with only the biting cold of an early Kansas morning to cheer him on.

About five minutes later, when the bugle blew assembly, the cadets began to assemble in their company streets. They came stumbling out of their tents tying ties, buttoning shirts, and yawning continuously.

A sergeant visited every tent to see that all the occupants were out. When he came to the last tent, he almost collided with a tall youth who was fumbling with his wrap-leggings.

"Well, Parker," rebuked the officer, "can't you ever be out on time? You'll get put on pit detail to-day for this, while the others have rifle practice."

"Oh, I'd get it anyway," snapped Parker, as he hurried to his place in the line.

After assembly, the Captain spoke to the company.

"To-day is the day that you try out for your marksmanship medals," he began, "and as there must be two markers at each of the two targets allotted to this company, I have assigned this duty to four men, as a punishment for being late to assembly."

Then he read off the names. Parker's was the first on the list, and on hearing himself commissioned, this irate youth let out a long stream of fervent words, which censured the army and anything connected with the army.

"They're always assigning some extra duty to me," he grumbled to the man next to him. "I'm glad there are only three days of camp left."

Parker's father had given his son anything he wanted, and consequently had spoiled the boy. The officers at camp heaped the wretchedest fatigues upon him, because he refused to obey orders promptly. Although Parker did not realize it, this month at camp benefited him more than any other during his entire life.

Despite his unpopularity with the seat of authority, Parker was well liked by the other cadets. He was captain of the company baseball team, and during the athletic competition, he won the cup for the "century" by running that race in a burst of speed which astonished the onlookers, and turning in a time of less than ten seconds.

This was nearly the last day of camp, and the entire third platoon was "policing" up the company street.

"The Captain told me yesterday that I would be forbidden to attend the company dance to-night," he confided to one of his friends. "I've been looking forward to it all summer, and now I've been forbidden to attend it. There's a certain Colonel's daughter—"

"Never mind," interrupted one of his friends. "I'm going to-night, and I'll tell you all about it."

A shrill whistle drowned out Parker's reply.

The cadets rushed into their tents, got their rifles, and hurried out into the company street. They were lined up, and marched over to the rifle range.

The pit detail was marched off separately. It was their duty to mark up the results of the shots fired by the marksmen. If the bullet entered the "bull's-eye", the scorer raised a blue flag. If it entered the space just outside the "bull's-eye", the scorer raised a red flag, and so on.

The rifle pits were concrete trenches at the bottom of a hill, and were situated two hundred yards from the firing line. The spent bullets hurled themselves into the ground after they had passed through the targets.

The firing began at ten o'clock, and from that time on, Parker did not have time to talk. He and his companion were kept busy pulling the target down, and signaling the results of the shots.

About eleven-thirty the firing ceased for a few minutes, and the boys rested.

"We ought to be done soon," presumed Parker.

"I hope so," said his friend.

Suddenly the firing began again with renewed consistency.

A few minutes later the cadet who was working with Parker looked at the bullets as they buried themselves into the earth back of the targets. With a start he stopped, and with terror in his face exclaimed, "Parker, look here, quick".

"Where? I don't see anything."

"Right over there, can't you see it? Isn't that a child?"

"It's Colonel Kirk's baby daughter," gasped Parker. "She's here to watch the firing and the nurse must have been careless and let the child stray. She's right behind the rifle pits in the line of fire. She'll surely be killed. I'm going after her."

"Stay here, you fool," shouted his companion, over the noise of the fire. He made a grab for Parker, but his rash friend was gone.

Parker clambered out of the trench, and ran up the hill to the place where the child was playing. Seizing her in his arms, he started back toward the rifle pits. He had not gone more than two feet when he stumbled, and fell, wounded. Then, half crawling, half rolling, he finally dragged the child back into the shelter of the pits.

A few hours later as Parker lay in the post hospital, Colonel Kirk and his wife came to him.

"Son," said the Colonel, "my wife and I want to thank you for what you have done for us. Is there anything I can do for you now?"

"Yes," said Parker hesitatingly, "there is something. It's such a small thing though, that I hate to ask you. The doctor says that I will be able to go to the company dance to-night. May I have your permission?"

"Why certainly," said the grateful Colonel.

That night the happiest cadet at the Company A dance was a smiling youth, with his arm in a sling, dancing with Mary Kirk, the Colonel's elder daughter.

Romance

TURRETED castle with crumbling wall,
The haunting note of the shrill flute's call,
The flash of skirts that leave perfume
As they swish and rustle thru a rose-filled room.
The shine of buckles on tiny feet,
That lightly tread a deserted street,
The gleam of swords in the grey dawn light,
A silent meeting in the dark of night,
A murmur of voices thru a fast-closed door,
Stealthy footsteps on a red-stained floor,
The faintest echo of an old dance tune,
The sparkle of gems in the light of the moon,
A pirate ship on a stormy sea,
An iron-bound chest with a rusty key,
The startling sound of a pistol shot,
A stifled scream from a lonely spot.
The glow of candles on welling tears,
The noiseless passage of endless years,
Are shiny links in that golden chain
That some call romance—but I call Spain!

Torchbearers

THE Torchbearers" is the Soldan chapter of the National Honor Society of Secondary Schools.

The purpose of the society according to Article I of the constitution is: "to create an enthusiasm for scholarship, to stimulate a desire to render service, to promote leadership, and to develop character among the students". The emblem bears a flaming torch and the four letters which signify character, scholarship, leadership, and service.

Only fifteen per cent of any class may be elected. Each must rank in the upper one-third and must also be outstanding in character, leadership, and service.

The honor bestowed by election to the National Honor Society is the highest that any high school can confer on its students.

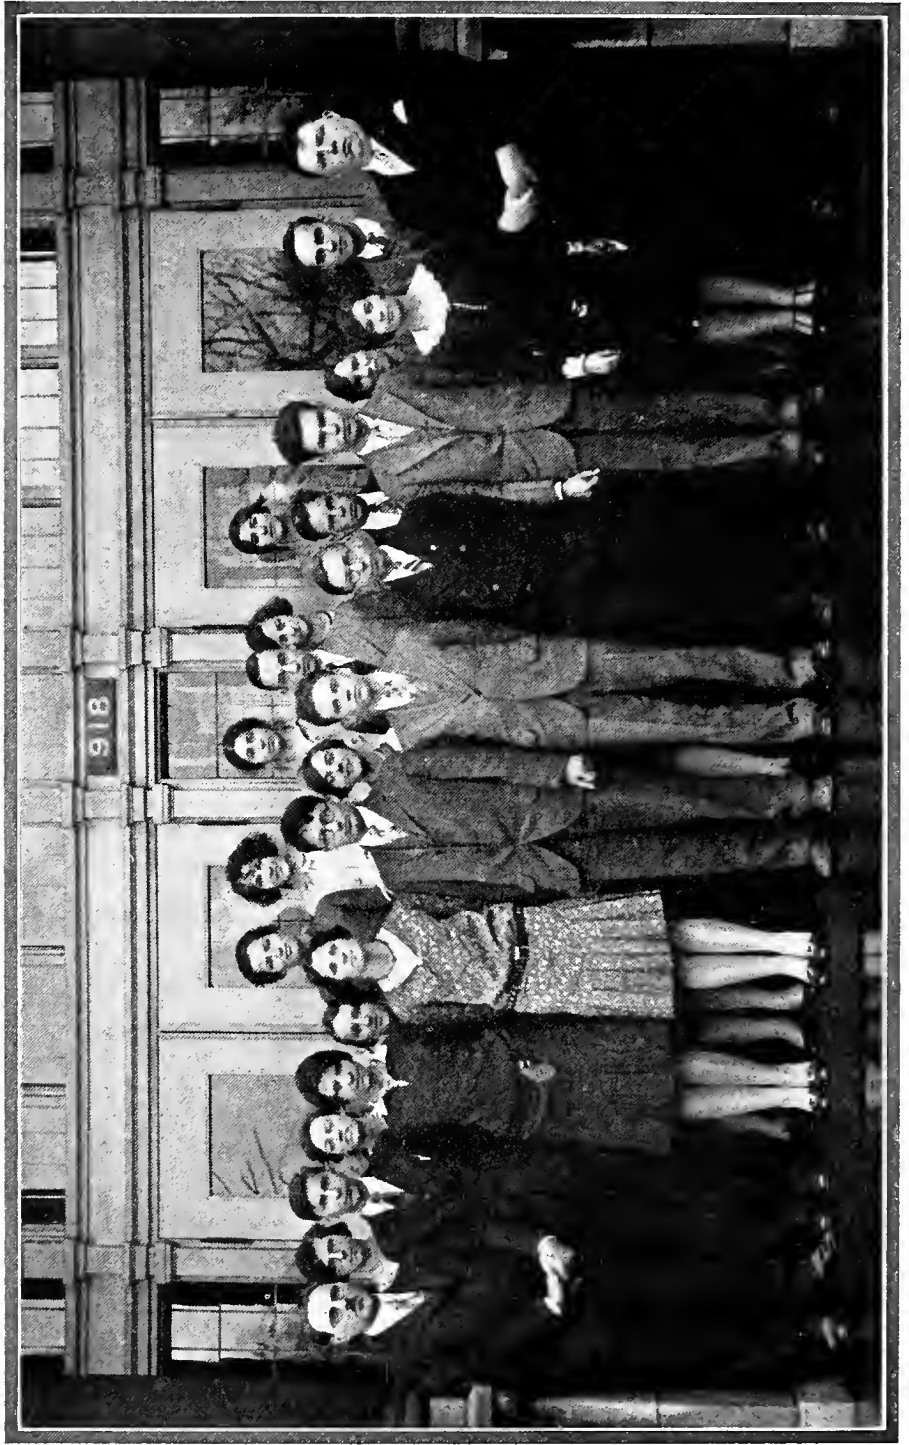

Twenty-four were elected from the January class and forty-two from the June.

The following are the members from the class of January, 1929:

Herbert Arst	Shirley Krisman	Saunders Reinhard
Marjorie Banks	Virginia Kurzdorfer	Minnie Romansky
Adele Biederman	Betty Lowenhaupt	Samuel Rosenbloom
Marjorie Boat	Henry Lowenhaupt	David Rothman
Margaret Compton	Catherine Magness	Rosalie Solomon
Mildred Coopersmith	Sabina Mendelson	Terrell Vaughan
Gwendolyn Darragh	August Plym	Ernest Walker
Lawrence Kingsland	Mary Reinhard	Regina Wender

The following are the Torchbearers from the June class:

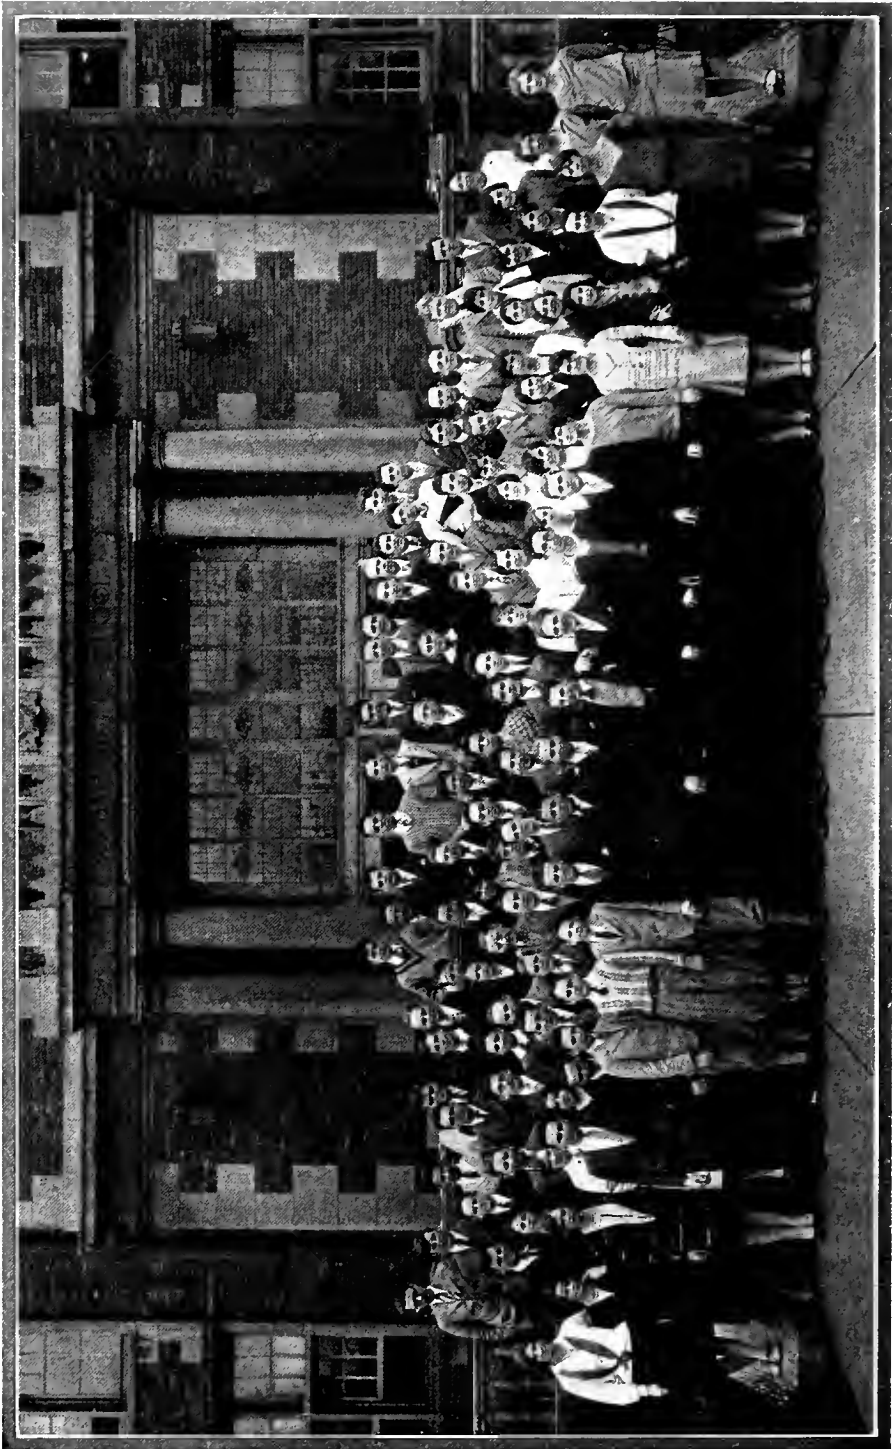

Bernard Agruss	Fannie Goodman	Ruth E. Miller
Elizabeth Allison	Fred Hall	Conrad Otto
Lillian Alvis	Evelyn Mae Honigberg	Theola Palmer
Marie Balsamo	Glaneuse Kraleman	Esther Priwer
Susan Beckwith	Thelma Kutten	Arthur Proctor
Barnett Blakemore	Alexander Langsdorf	Betty Reel
Calvin Busch	Edna Leapord	Elise Rosenberger
Kathryn De Jarnette	Jeannette Lewald	Robert Russell
John Delavan	Clifford Lewis	Cecilia Schwartz
Natalie Dozier	Margaret Lovell	Ruth Sheldon
Nestor Du Vall	Berta Mayfield	John Toedtman
James Eastham	Edward Meisenbach	S-Marie Vaughn
Agnes Eilers	Lawrence Mendonsa	Joseph Washtien
Helen Fabbri	Pearl Miller	Virginia Wulff

Service Club

THE Soldan Service Club was organized in June, 1924, to form the right bower of the faculty. As such, it has functioned perfectly during the last year under the careful guidance of Miss Rasmusson, the sponsor. The organization consists primarily of sevens and seniors who can afford to sacrifice a study period or any part of their time to lighten the burden of the faculty. Few realize the magnitude of their operations. They serve in the lunch rooms, help in the rest room, keep order in the corridors, devote spare time to office work and to running errands, and, in general, they exert the combined strength of their organization to "bring order out of chaos", as Mr. Powell so loves to put it.

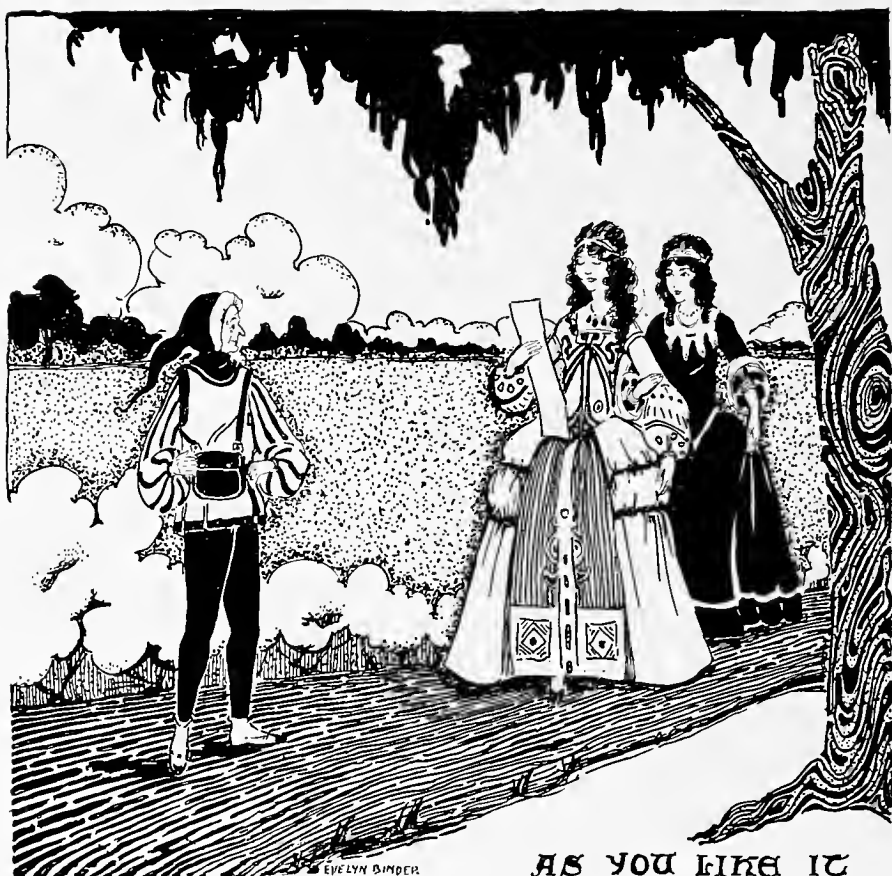

The club has been given the honor of inaugurating into Soldan the practice of cataloguing all activities, scholastic or non-scholastic, of the student body. This keeping of a miniature biography of each student is calculated to be of great aid in supplying information to colleges or employers who make inquiries regarding the character, ability, and interest of our graduates. Through such service as this, the club hopes to maintain the high standard of its name. It includes about one hundred active members who occupy probably one hundred and thirty positions.

The officers for the term of September to January were:

President.....	Frank McCoy
Vice-President.....	Rosalie Solomon
Secretary	David Rothman
Treasurer	Nestor Du Vall

The officers for this term are:

President.....	Arthur Proctor
Vice-President.....	Ruth Ellen Sheldon
Secretary.....	Jeanette Lewald
Treasurer.....	Bernard Agruss

The Scrip

The Scrip ♣ In Milton's "Comus" the Shepherd Lad opens his "leathern scrip" and culls from its thousand simples the blessed Haemony of sovran charm to unlock every evil spell. We whom fortune has placed at the beginning of literary tradition at Soldan would gather into our SCRIP treasures from our shepherd's hills, treasures from our pilgrim's journeys, treasures of intellectual and artistic endeavor. Our building, strong and beautiful; our teachers, devoted and inspiring; our students, earnest and hopeful;—all are contributing to a history worthy to be recorded and perpetuated. Whatever contributes to the life that pulses through the many activities and interests of our school it will be the purpose of THE SCRIP to gather; laboratory and shop, brush and pen, play-hour and work-hour have their treasures for THE SCRIP. From everywhere THE SCRIP would gather the thousand simples; will you help? And, perhaps in far-away years some gray-haired shepherd may cull from its parchment treasures the blessed Haemony that makes age young. Therefore, will you be of and for our SCRIP?

(Quotation from first Scrip.)

This exalted purpose was set forth in the first Scrip. The staffs that have come and gone have earnestly tried to live up to it. Deep into the spirit of the school they have probed to find and record everything that is lovely, everything that is worth while, everything that helps, everything that serves. They have wrought an enduring monument of deeds accomplished, of knowledge offered, with the pen that is "mightier than the sword". The historians of the school are they, sifting each year's events and culling therefrom the greatest, that those to come might know them by their works. Always Scrip has unconsciously led the school, molding its thought, spurring it on to higher achievements by its silent record of deeds past. Let us walk, therefore like Touchstone, "not with bag and baggage, but with Scrip and Scrippage".

SCRIPPAGE CLASS

Scrippage

STILL don't know what caused it. Perhaps it was simply fatigue from writing too long on that editorial, or perhaps it was the unaccustomed coffee I had had for dinner.

However, the fact remains that it happened. I say "it" because I really don't know exactly what to call it. But this is how it happened. Worn out from rewriting the editorial for the fourth time and at the same time thinking of a French examination on the morrow, I burst out in exasperation.

"No one ever worked for Scrippage as hard as I do. Gosh! Who ever started the thing anyhow?"

"Oh yes, many have worked harder, a great deal harder than you," replied a small, precise voice. "And would you really like to know how it started?"

Amazed, I looked at the pile of crumpled paper (the vain fruits of many deep thoughts) before me, from which the voice seemed to come. There I saw a—but there is no name for it; it can only be described. It was a figure not more than a foot high. Its body was lamentably thin, poor thing, for it consisted of a single copy of Scrippage, somewhat shrunk in size. Its legs and arms were nothing more or less than single galley sheets, which fluttered with my every breath. But the most peculiar thing about it was its head, perched on a neck that greatly resembled an undersized fountain pen.

This head (composed of a wire basket similar to that which lies on the editor's desk, filled with sheets of paper covered with writing) had a face which puzzled me for some time because of its haunting familiarity. After staring intently at it for some time I discovered the cause of this. The face contained the expressions of the whole editorial staff at the same time! In this one countenance I could see reflected those of Lester Handelman, editor-in-chief; Waldo Smith, business manager, Ruth C. Miller, Florence Rubenstein, and Henry Hopewell, the news editors; Marjorie Meyer and Kenneth Bennett, the sport editors; Esther Priwer and Nestor Du Vall, the club editors; Berta Mayfield and Dorothy Compton, humor editors; Helen Bramsch and Esther Blitz, exchange editors; Elva Wagner, Theola Palmer, and Donnis Bricker, typists; Sam Soffer and Dorothy Weiner, distribution editors; and Margaret Callahan, properties manager.

I no sooner recognized these startling facial features than the curious creature began to talk again in its precise voice, which gave me the impression that every comma, period, and capital was in its exact place.

"Even if I was born in 1917," it was saying, "when Mr. Powell named me by quoting that passage from 'As You Like It', 'Not with bag and baggage, but with Scrip and Scrippage', I wasn't very famous until 1921 when I really 'got going', as they say. Before 1917 Scrip, my sister, came out three times a term, but by then she had become too expensive, so at the suggestion of Arthur Schneff, the editor-in-chief of Scrip at that time, it was decided to have Scrip published only once a term and to have a weekly newspaper. That's m—er—I.

"Well, I was brought out then by various organizations, but I suppose that I do require a lot of work, because I wasn't anything to speak of until the fall of 1921, when Mr. Bruce Smith and an editorial staff, using the English classes in composition as reporters, took me in hand. Well, I stayed in good health under Mr. Smith's care until the February of 1928, when, to my deep sorrow, Mr. Smith died. However, I recovered from the shock quite nicely when I found that Miss Ueberle would take care of me, and I am now in fine health, thank you," and the ridiculous figure turned its flimsy body about for my inspection.

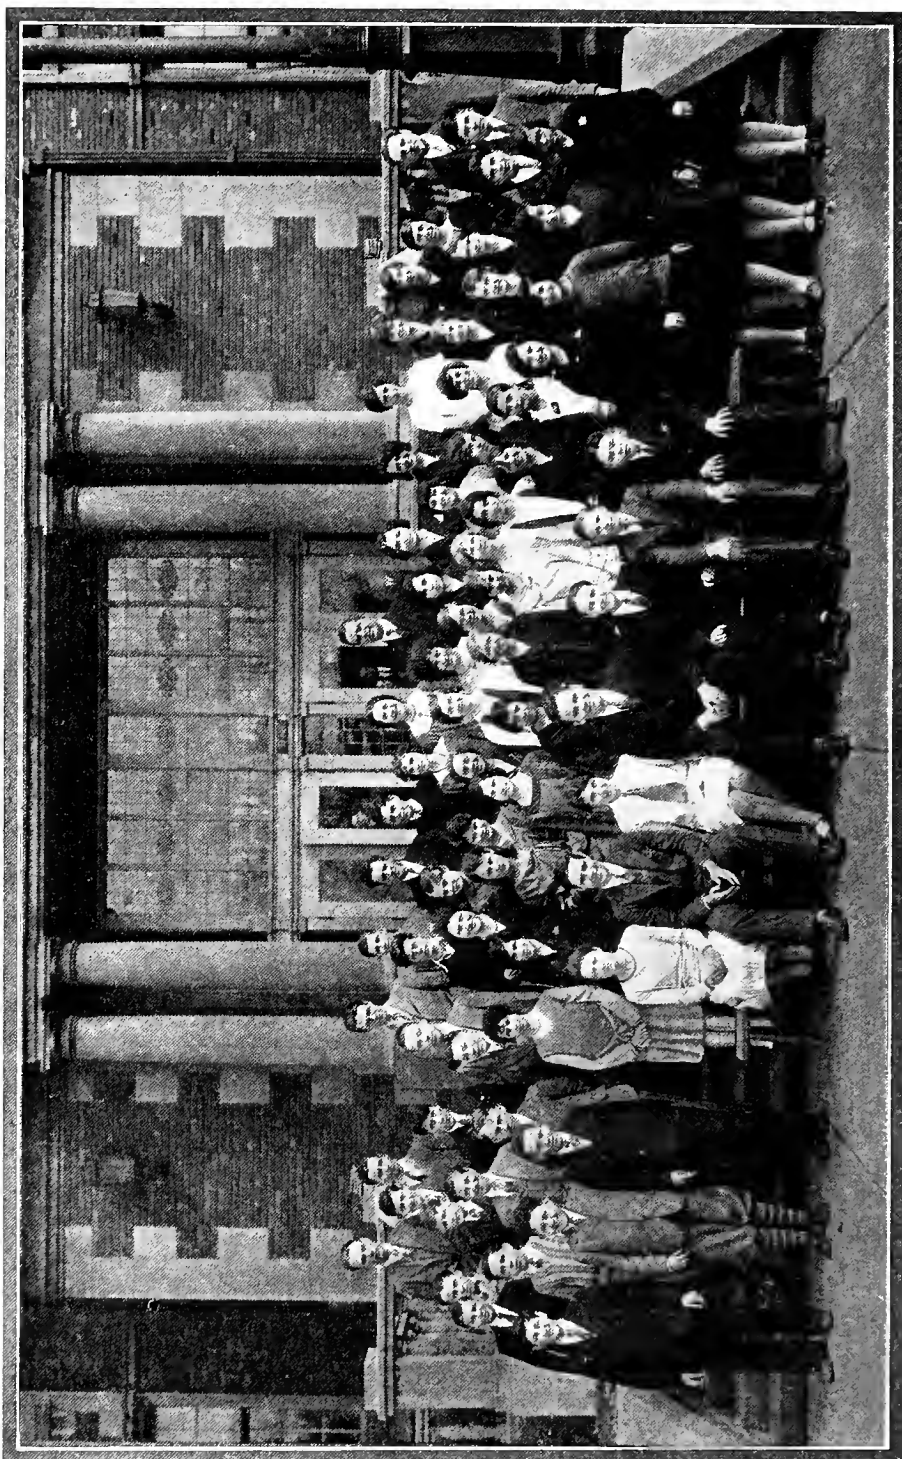

"But what, why—who?" I started to question.

But the figure was gone. Only a memory and the pile of crumpled paper remained.

Was it a dream? No, for on looking through school files the next day, I found that all the strange creature's information was quite accurate.

AGORA

The Agora

THE Agora is the "clearing house" of Soldan. Its members cheerfully drudge for the good of the school, and are the "right-hand men" of their advisors.

This important organization consists of the chairmen of all the advisory groups, and it holds its meetings in Room 130, under the leadership of Miss Brown. The members attend to the mechanism and workings of school life, collecting subscriptions to Scrip and Scrippage, making out Citizenship Quotient Records, and giving their advisors all the help they can with taking attendance and making out report cards.

The Agora also assists with any school activity it can, such as selling tickets to games. Thus it helps to arouse school spirit—and whoever heard of the Agora failing in its duties, however difficult or distasteful they may be? Truly, it is an important element in the development and the progress of Soldan.

Sammies and Susies

OUR memories sometimes have really worthwhile consequences, as witness the Sammies and Susies. Noel Robyn, possessor of a lot of ingenuity and a poor memory, began, 'way back when he was in grammar school, to call his chosen buddies "Sammy". Said buddies became so numerous that Noel soon addressed every body he met as Sammy. He carried his practice into Soldan, where he met Betty Reel, who gave him the idea of calling the girls "Susie". The idea grew and in February, 1929, all the Sammies and Susies who could, attended an organization meeting. The following officers were elected:

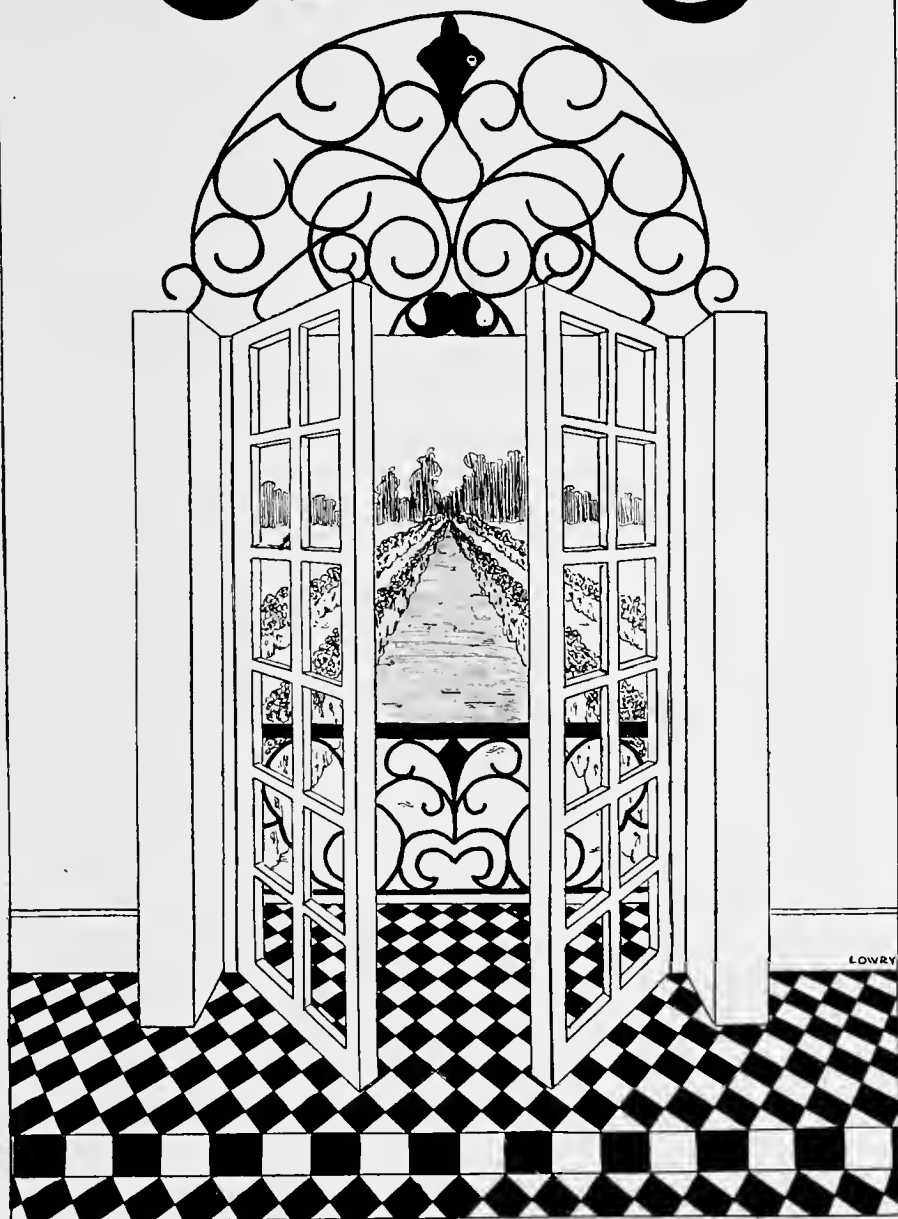

President.....Noel Robyn
Vice-President.....Jeannette Lewald

A constitution was drawn up, a permanent membership committee was appointed, and the Sammies and Susies were definitely under way. They have already assisted the Mothers' Club in the fight for soap and towels, and they intend to be the main link between the school and outsiders from other cities. However, the club's proudest boast is that it is the least exclusive in the school. It even has faculty members. Two of these, Susie Parks and Sammy Powell, consented to sponsor the organization.

ORCHESTRA

Orchestra

HETHER our fancies are guided by Orpheus' magic music, or whether we are being led through "The Hall of the Mountain King", we halt as the cymbals crash, and the orchestra ceases to play.

Yes—it is Soldan's orchestra in its attempt to interpret all that is beautiful and harmonious in music, all that paints inspiring pictures, rich in musical shading.

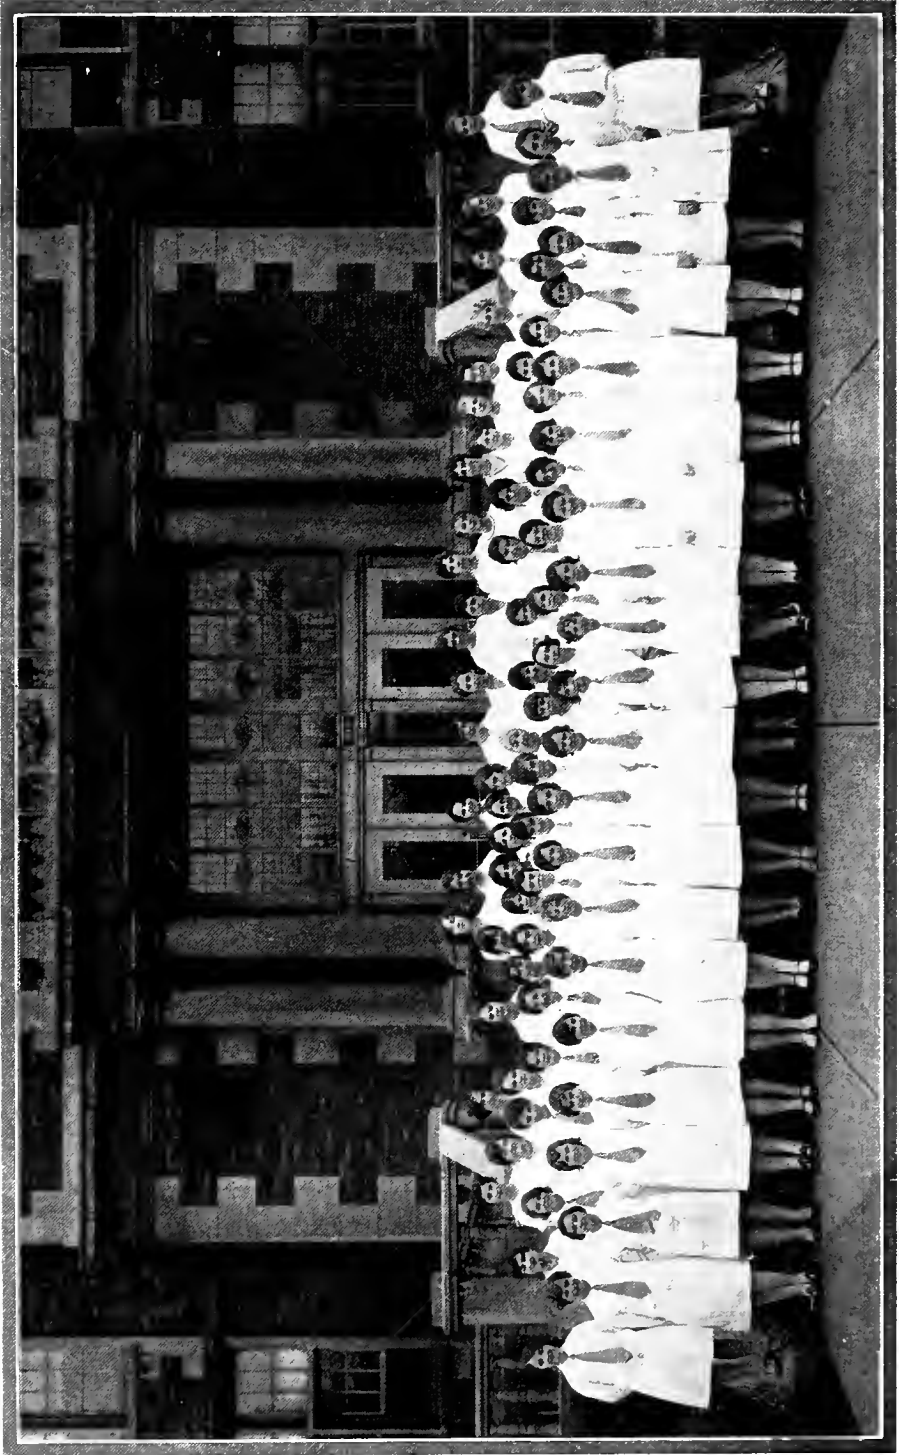

Under the untiring and painstaking efforts of Miss M. Teresa Finn, and with but a single rehearsal a week, the orchestra has made splendid progress in the last term. The orchestra is working diligently at present on Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and on Tschaikowsky's "5th Symphony". It is concentrating its attention especially on "Marche Slav", which is the selection to be played in the Pageant, which will take place in May. Extra rehearsals are being held each morning for this purpose.

Soldan's orchestra claims many noted musicians who have risen to prominence. Abe Smith, Walter Vriedenberg, and Louis Etzkow are playing in the Symphony Orchestra. The Knapp sisters, Ben Feld, Meyer Lipsitz, and Meyer Shumitsky have all attained places of distinction, and although but recent graduates, Dave Rothman, Ernest Walker, John Willis, and Joe Carofoil have been recognized in local music circles.

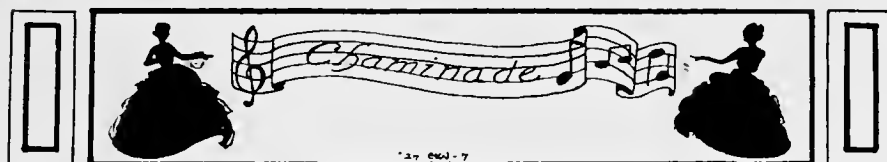

Each term the orchestra loses many members, but Miss Finn finds encouragement in new talent, steady progress, great perseverance, and rare enthusiasm.

CILAMINADE

HERE is a time when refined and artistic singing is heard in the music room. That time occurs during a Chaminade rehearsal. The group of girls who form the club have done commendable work under the able guidance of Miss M. Teresa Finn. They do more than merely sing as those who have heard them will readily agree. Under Miss Finn's direction the club has gained a fine knowledge of shading and interpretation which is evident in all its presentations.

The latest outstanding work in which the club played an important part was the "Mikado", a humorous light opera production. The majority of the girls sang in the chorus while certain of the more talented and trained singers took leading roles. The presentation was of course a remarkable success.

Incidentally, parts of the operetta will be presented in Soldan's twentieth anniversary Pageant to which the music clubs are looking forward.

The dedication of the new Steinway piano for the music room this term was an important event for the Chaminade. But the outstanding point here is that the members wore the new white uniforms, which are very neat and attractive with the ties of yellow.

Recently a group of the girls formed a "West End Singing Club" which operates outside of school. This group has won two medals, one at the Woman's Exposition, and one at the Jefferson City contest of music clubs.

The following are the officers of the club:

President.....	Anna Rae Fitch
Vice-President	Jessie Mills
Secretary.....	Ethel Jones

Helen Ross JUNIOR CHAMPADE

The Junior Chaminade

OLDAN has added to its list of successful clubs the Junior Chaminade. Because the Chaminade had a waiting list of considerable length, a new club, or junior club, was organized. Many names for the new club were suggested, but the most appropriate seemed "Junior Chaminade"; for, after all, this club is a preparation for the older club. The Junior Chaminade has an enrollment of fifty members this term. These members are in the freshman and sophomore years. No specific uniform has been chosen as yet, but the girls have agreed to wear white on their public appearances. Violet is the club's color, for it designates simplicity. Miss McGrew is the sponsor who has guided the Junior Chaminade out of a somewhat bewildered beginning into a steady and dependable club. The Junior Chaminade is glad for this opportunity to express its gratitude to Dorothy Weiner, who has been an able accompanist. Dorothy has given us one afternoon each week, for which we are very grateful.

The aim of the Junior Chaminade is to further the musical education of its members so that each one may apply the training received in her own chosen way. The songs are selected with the greatest care in order that the girls, who are training for the Chaminade, may possess a varied repertoire and may gain experience in singing three part as well as two part choruses. The Junior Chaminade has prospered in its weekly meetings. A very enthusiastic group of girls sing in Room 124 each Thursday. The club has held about five tryouts since February in order to test the voices of the many applicants for membership. As to public appearances, the Junior Chaminade has two to its credit. Just before Christmas the club sang Christmas carols for the Mothers' Club, and on December 8th assisted the Chaminade and Glee Clubs by ushering for "The Mikado".

A very delightful party was given on March 1st at which those members who had graduated into the Chaminade were guests.

The present officers of the club are:

GLEE CLUB

The Glee Club

SINCE its organization, in 1909, when, cooperating with the Chaminade, it presented "The Captain of Plymouth", the Glee Club has played a leading role in nearly all the important events which have taken place in Soldan. Among other things, the club has given two comic operas, "Louisiana" and "Pepita", in which half of the boys impersonated girls. Another of the activities was a Spanish dance which was staged in a number of places in St. Louis by ten boys, five of whom were dressed as girls.

The club, under the leadership of its capable sponsor, Mr. Hall, has, like the school, completed its twentieth and most successful year.

Last term after the election of officers—Adrian Bray, President of the club; George Dorian, Vice-President; George Cosmos, Secretary; William Bray, Treasurer; and Robert Hilliard, Librarian—the club devoted most of its time to practice for Sullivan's comic opera, "The Mikado". The leads in this most successful presentation were played by Adrian Bray, Nathan Neuman, Evans Burnite, Charles Chartrand, and George Lowe.

The club has led the school in a number of "pep" sessions, particularly after the Roosevelt football game; and, following an old tradition, sang carols both at school and over KMOX just before Christmas.

After the officers—Adrian Bray, President; William Bray, Vice-President; Earl Blankenmeister, Secretary; Robert Sherwood, Treasurer; and Robert Hilliard, Librarian—were chosen for the second term of this year, the Glee Club centered its attention upon preparation for the coming Pageant celebrating Soldan's twentieth birthday.

However, in spite of its intensive work on the Pageant, the club sang for the school on the occasion of Coach Stagg's visit to Soldan, sang again at the presentation exercises for the Michigan Cup, and also sang at Scrugg's Auditorium when a program was given by the Federation of Music Clubs.

In the Pageant, the club took the lead in presenting the motif of Soldan's part in the World War. For this motif, Mr. Hall, the sponsor, prepared a special medley of war songs and wrote a magnificent new marching song.

This year the club celebrated its successes with a picnic at Mr. Hall's beautiful home overlooking the Mississippi and with a dance held at school. Both events were most enjoyable.

At present, there are seventy-eight members in the Glee Club.

Aero Club

AVIATION plays an increasingly important part in modern transportation. The knowledge of this factor in world advancement accounts for the tremendous popularity of aeronautical societies throughout the country.

Realizing that aviation could best be promoted by educating the people in regard to its possibilities, on March 5, 1929, a group of progressive students, in the hope that interest in aviation might be created among their companions, formed the Soldan Aero Club for the purpose of a general study of aeronautics.

Although this unique organization was founded only this term it is already a great success. Actual flying is offered the members and a number of them have taken advantage of the opportunity which the club presents to prepare for future work in aviation.

Camera Club

LIKING through the park "snapping" landscapes and animal life, making "trick" pictures, discussing the fine points of developing and printing are only a few of the activities of the Camera Club. This peppy club was reorganized last term with Fred Hall, as president, and it has progressed rapidly since then. It has a program which should hold the interest in the club for quite a while. Its purpose is to promote better photography and to awaken the students to the enjoyment they can derive from this ever novel and living sport. Besides these activities mentioned, the club conducts contests which are based on skill in photography, developing, and printing. Snapshots taken, developed, and printed by the members are judged on exposure, composition, and other phases which are essential to a good picture. There are also sets of tests to be passed which indicate to what class of photographers each member belongs.

Soldan High Pickering Club

EN years ago a group of boys and girls in Soldan High School formed a club for the study of astronomy. They named it the Pickering Club in honor of Edward Charles Pickering, a famous American astronomer who died in that same year. Mr. Pickering had been the director of the Harvard College Observatory for forty years. Since the first organization there has always been a group of stargazers in Soldan High School.

The club owns a fine four and a half inch telescope, but, not being satisfied with that alone, the members have decided to build a spectro-helioscope, so that they can watch the huge eruptions of flame on the sun, and get detailed views and other interesting things on the sun.

We have discussed the ever fascinating question as to whether life exists on Mars and Venus, and have learned about our sister universes, the spiral nebulae.

This year the club joined the Mothers' Club in hearing Mr. Davis give a talk on astronomy, illustrated by slides, many of which he obtained from the Mount Wilson Observatory.

The club is a member of the Astronomical Society of the Pacific, and receives its publications, which lovers of astronomy value highly.

The Athenaeum

OR the last year the weekly program of the Athenaeum has consisted of a debate and a discussion alternately. This has proved very successful among the girls.

On April 19 the Athenaeum held an inter-club debate with the Rostrum on the subject, "Resolved, that Installation Plan Buying Should Be Discouraged". The boys upheld the affirmative, while the girls upheld the negative.

The Writers' Club

OMER and Vergil were in conference. The waiting list at Parnassus was growing and something had to be done about admitting new members into the exclusive "Mystic Circle".

There was a knock at the door, and an office boy entered.

"What, ho!" called Vergil.

"Some varlets wait without, sir."

"What? More scribblers seeking entrance to our sacred Parnassus! And who?"

"They say they are the Writers' Club of Soldan."

"What! Not the famous Writers' Club? And is Miss Yoffie with them? Then let them enter. Full honored are we to have them in our midst!"

ART APPRECIATION CLUB

Art Appreciation Club

RE you acquainted with Pithecanthropus erectus? Do you know what kind of cosmetics the Roman ladies used? Why so many chairs have claw feet? What the street lamps of mediaeval Venice were like? How piled velvet is made? How many keys it takes to open the "ebony chest"?

We members of the Art Appreciation Club have learned all this and more. We are learning to appreciate art by attending the special lectures given by Miss Powell at the City Art Museum; by making trips to the Artists' Guild and other places; by asking our sponsor, Miss Hazeltine, many and varied questions; and lastly, by trying out a little art for ourselves—mainly with pencil and paper. (You always appreciate a thing more, somehow, after you've tried it yourself!)

Our club meets on Thursday; alternate weeks we leave Room 323 to take trips to the Museum. Often on warmer days we visit the Zoo and sketch the two-legged and four-legged animals. We have about thirty-nine members at present and also a small waiting list. The only club requirements are to pay the dues (fifty cents per term) and to be an active and interested member. At the end of the term we have a grand picnic and eat up our dues. Oh, I know you won't believe it but they're extremely digestible. An individual missing four meetings in succession is dropped from the club list. Either boys or girls may join, and it is not necessary to study art, or to know how to draw. Each member is given a list of the two hundred and eight points obtainable and of which one hundred is required to receive a club emblem.

Oh, yes, I almost forgot to mention the pins! We're certainly proud of them. You've seen them, I'm sure; a little gold palette inscribed with the letters A. A. C., and attached by a dainty chain to the tiny golden "S".

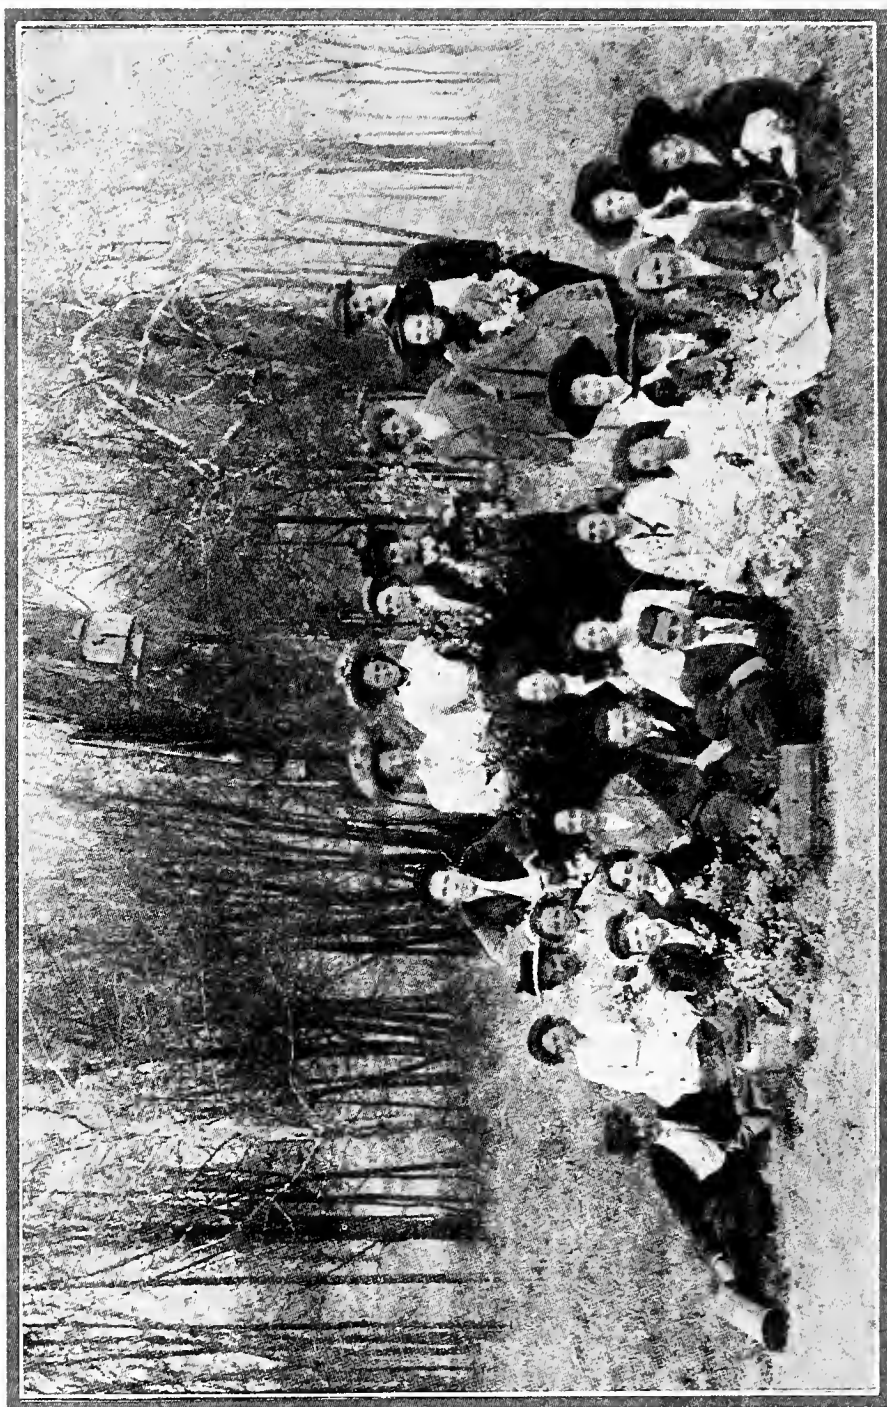

Now, after reading this, we know you're crazy to join, but, unfortunately, we have a full membership, so you'll have to wait until September to "appreciate art with the Art Appreciation Club".

BOTANICAL CLUB, 1909

Soldan Botanical Club

THE Soldan Botanical Club was organized during the school's first year. A high standard of work has been consistently maintained. About 1918 the school began offering seals for club work. The following have received honor awards from the Botanical Club since that time:

Gussie Baker
Adele Brod
Ballard Clemmons
Carmene Davidson
Florence Davis
Henry Edmonds
Harold Hanke
Waymond Hollyman
Malcolm Jones
Ernestine Long
Hale Moore
Fred Pough
Harold Pough
Louis Ray

Walter Richardson
Harriet Schwenk
Martin Seidel
Melvin Skellet
William Stevens
Julian Steyermark
Mildred Tatum
Harry Trower
William Trower
Mildred Twellman
Ethel Wagner
Oliver William
Levering Whittemore

Members of the club enjoy studying nature first-hand. Foraging parties scour the woods and find secrets not only of plant life but of mineral and vegetable life as well. Many of the places the club visits are rarely seen, because they are inaccessible to automobiles. After a long tramp, a short interesting talk and a picnic lunch are pleasant relaxation.

The following is the membership during the school year 1928-1929:

Arthur Boroughf

BOTANICAL CLUB

Golf Club

UNDER the new sponsorship of Mr. Gerber the Golf Club hopes to continue much as it was under the sponsorship of Mr. MacQueary, who resigned because of ill health.

Each year the club holds a spring and a fall tournament; the winner is presented with a cup and the runners-up with medals. The four semifinalists of the spring contest form the golf team which represents Soldan in the interscholastic competition. Soldan, for the past two years, has won the league trophy and needs but one more victory to obtain permanent possession of it. Because of the loss of our champion, Harry Baker, and the return of only two of last year's stars, our victory this term is somewhat uncertain. Nevertheless, we hope Soldan will again win the championship and permanent possession of the golf trophy.

The Golf Club extends a most hearty invitation to all who are interested in the game and again wishes to emphasize the fact that golf has become a letter sport. Any boys interested in the club may come to the meetings in Room 105 at the close of school. The day of meeting is posted upon the boys' bulletin board in front of the large gym.

Debating Team

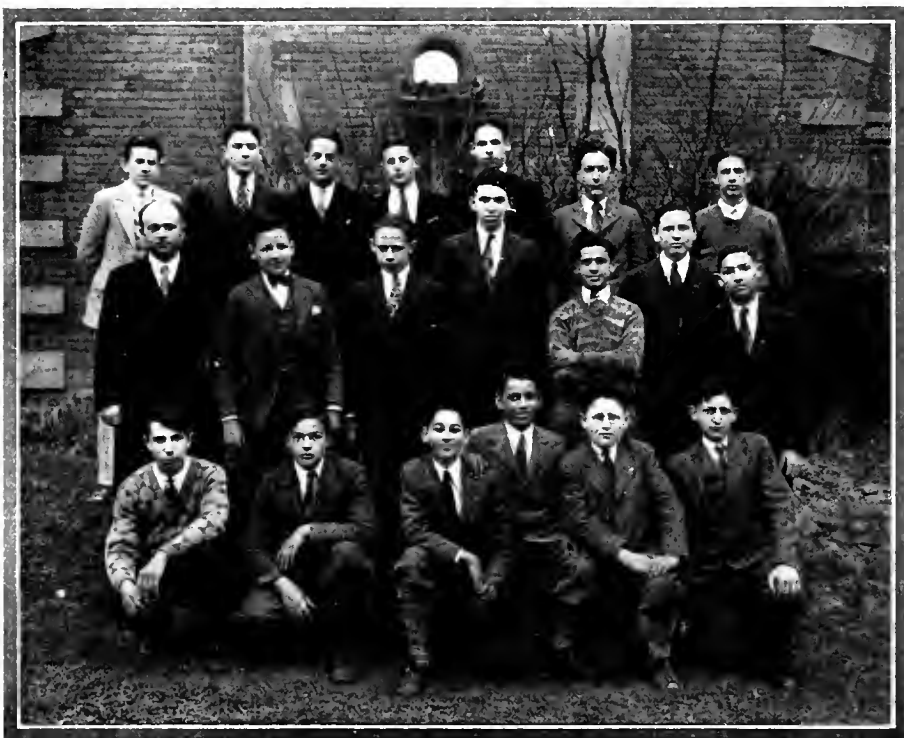

THE Debating Team of 1929 has won the Princeton Cup. This is the first time for many years that Soldan has won any great honor in debating. The honor is doubly great because of the tenseness of the situation before the final debate with Cleveland which was held on April 6. During the tenth week of last term, the tryouts for speakers were held. After much deliberation and selection by a committee of teachers, the following teams were chosen: Affirmative—Abraham Gallant, Melvin Hurtzman, Bernard Agruss, and Joseph Washtien. Negative—Hymen Waltuch, Barnett Blakemore, Robert Brooks, and Julius Mayer. The teams immediately began to read on the question that had been chosen for debate this year, Resolved: That legislation should be enacted embodying the principles of the McNary-Haugen Farm Relief Bill. During the Christmas week and the examination week the speeches were put in final shape and the work of brushing up and getting rid of stage fright was begun. Mr. Mathie, the coach of the team, drilled the boys on rebuttal and speaking. Several other teachers also helped with developing the speakers.

The first debates were held on March 22. The negative team met the Beaumont affirmative at Beaumont and the affirmative met the Roosevelt negative at Soldan. Both teams won unanimously. Cleveland also won both of her debates and a final debate was needed to decide the possessor of the Princeton Cup for the year. If Cleveland won, the cup would remain permanently in her possession as only three legs are required and she had won two in the two years just preceding. The Soldan negative debated at Soldan against the Cleveland affirmative and the Soldan affirmative went to Cleveland. Of these debates Soldan lost one and won one unanimously but when the ratings were obtained it was found that Soldan had won by two points, the score being 16-14.

The debaters all feel well repaid for the time that was put in on the work and their only hope is that when the tryouts are held next year that there will be more boys who will take an interest in the debating team and aid them in the development of the material to use in the debates next year.

CHEMISTRY CLUB

Chemistry Club

HE future belongs to Science. More and more she will control the destinies of the nations. Already she has them in her crucible and on her balances. In her new mission to humanity, she preaches a new gospel." Sir William Osler.

On May 1, 1915, a petition signed by Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Kruh, Mr. Teeters, and sixty students was sent to Mr. Powell, requesting a charter for the organization of the Soldan Chemistry Club. Under the leadership of these men the club advanced rapidly. In 1925 Miss Voit accepted the sponsorship which Mr. Weisert, our present sponsor, accepted in September.

The highest aim of the club is to promote interest in chemistry, and allied sciences, and to show their importance to our everyday life. In order to see the practical side of this science, frequent trips are made and by special invitation the club has made a tour of inspection through the United Drug Company, Ward's Bakery, and the Scullin Steel Plant.

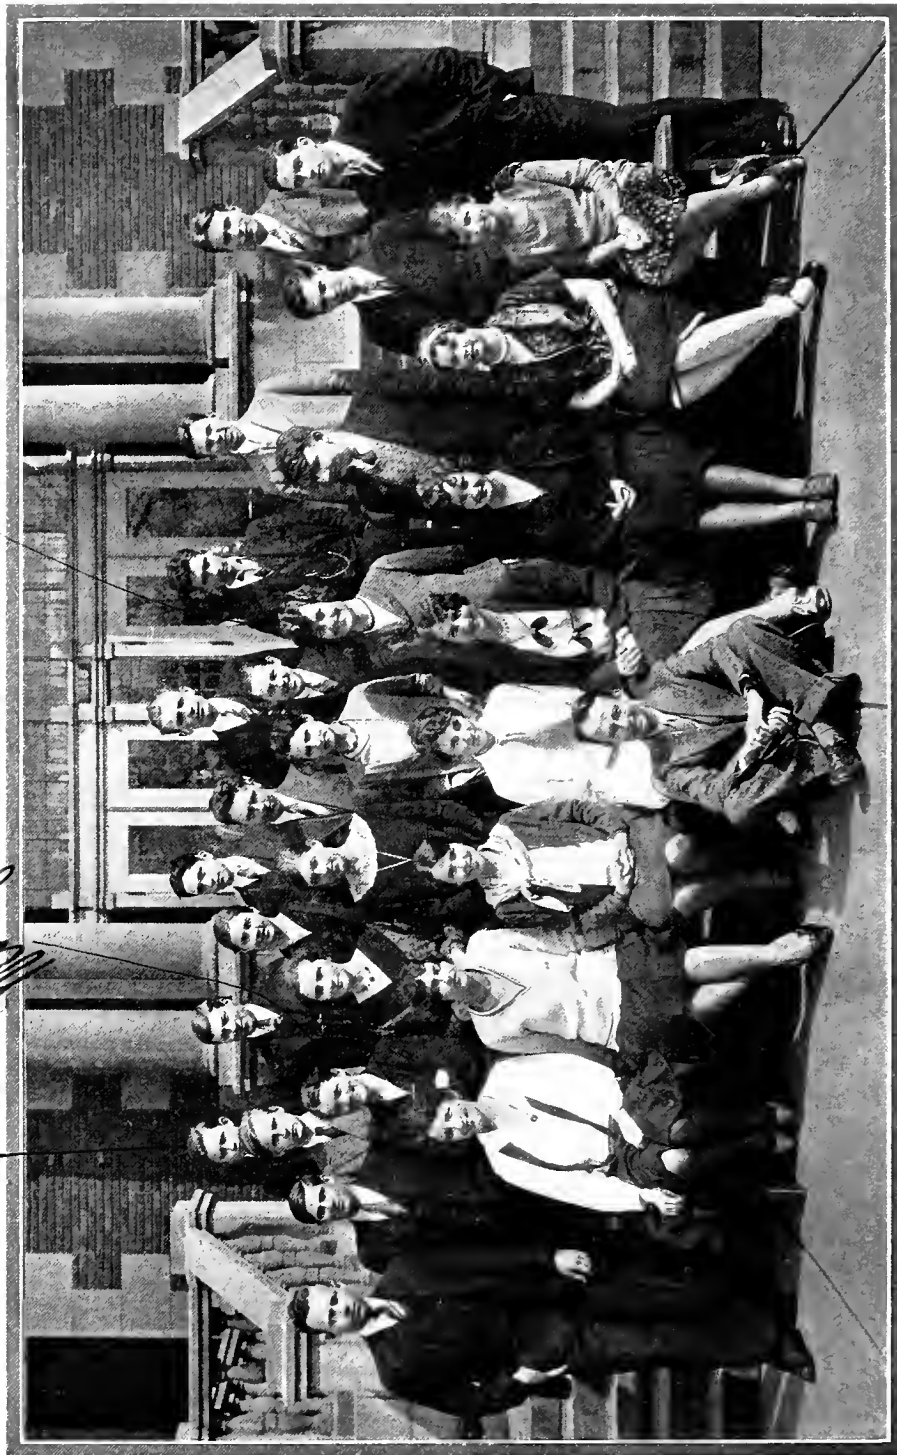

In addition to these trips in order to emphasize the importance of chemistry interesting and instructive talks are given by members of the club.

The Physics Department has granted us the privilege of using the motion picture machine, and we have enjoyed seeing films of "A Trip Thru Cement-land", "A Trip Thru Brick-land", and "A Trip Thru Film-land". Thus we realize in a measure how chemistry is applied to industry and how "Science controls the destinies of the nations".

Probably the most important event of the year is the Chemistry Club's annual exhibition. It is Soldan's Chemical Engineers' Day. Each member exhibits and demonstrates that which interests him most and the school is thus initiated into the work of the club.

But do not think that it is a club of "all work and no play", for, as guests of Mr. Weisert at his country place, many good times have been had. Officers:

The Soldan Dramatic Guild

HE Dramatic Guild is nearing the completion of another successful year, during which it has again ranked among the most active clubs of the school. This year after the election of Jeannette Lewald, president; Natalie Dozier, vice-president; Joe Bachelder, Jr., secretary; Grace Crowe, treasurer; Kirtley Black, sergeant-at-arms, a tryout was held to replenish the membership which was somewhat depleted by graduations. About seventy-five students applied for admittance into the Guild and of them a number were accepted. At present the membership is over thirty.

Immediately after the tryout last term, the Guild began work on a two-act play, "Chris'mus Gif," which, as has been the custom during the past years, was presented in the auditorium the day before school closes for the Christmas holidays.

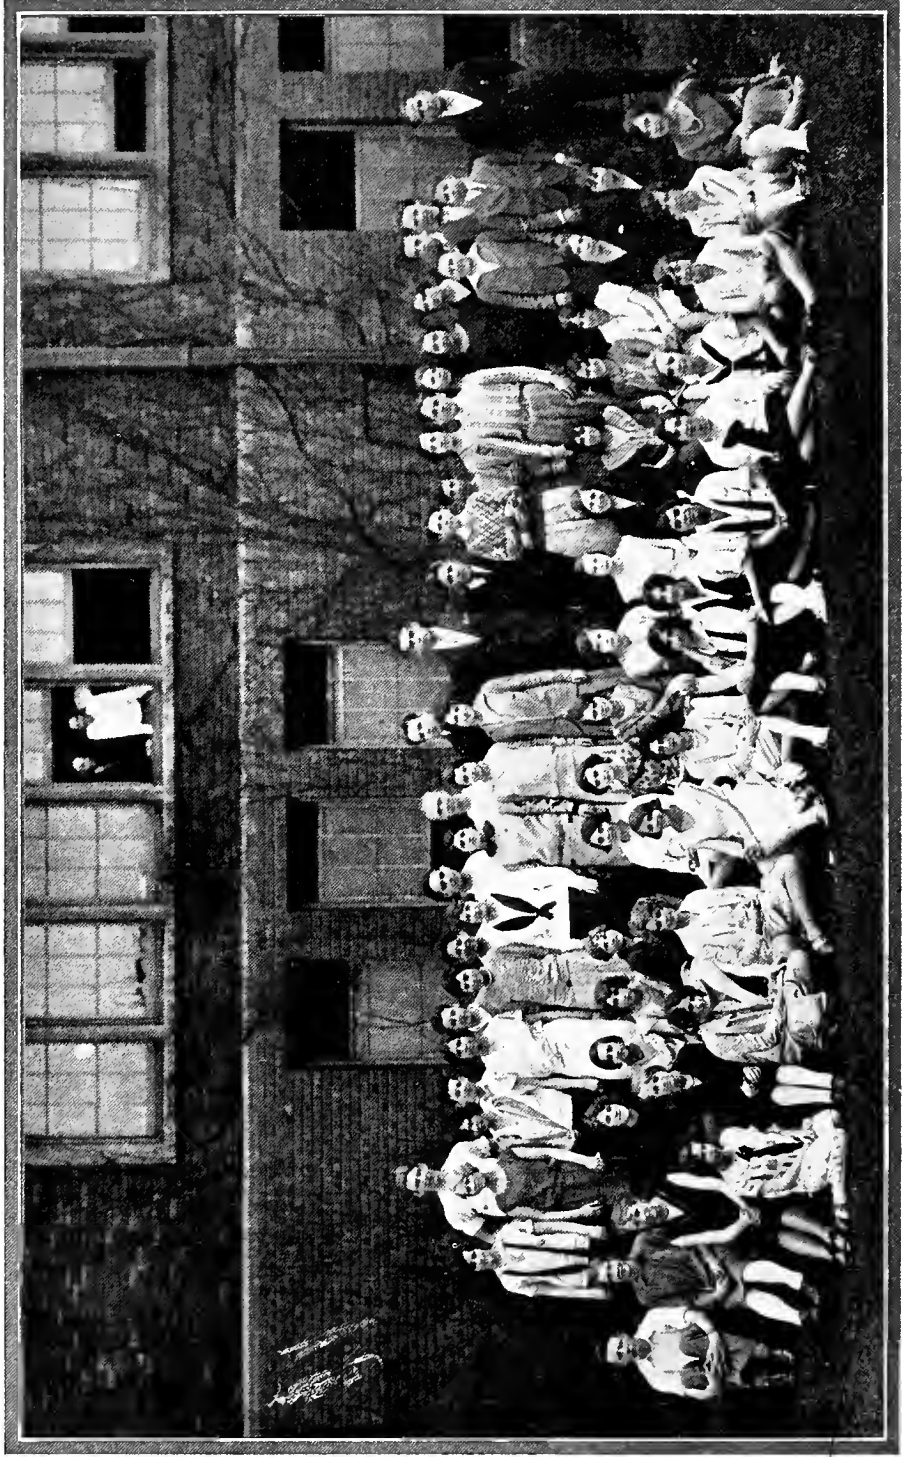

During the present term the activities of the Guild have been somewhat more varied. First it was necessary to elect officers. Those chosen were: Grace Crowe, president; Bob Campbell, vice-president; Jane Saft, secretary; John Delavan, treasurer; and Kirtley Black, sergeant-at-arms. Another tryout was held at which several students of very promising ability were admitted to membership.

After the tryout the Guild devoted itself to preparations for a one-act comedy, "The Flattering Word", which was very well received on April 1 by a mixed audience of the Mothers' Club, the Sammies and Susies, and numerous other students and faculty members. Even at that time, work had begun on the Dramatic Guild's part in the Pageant commemorating Soldan's twentieth anniversary. Practice for this offering, an excerpt from the "Midsummer Night's Dream", occupied nearly all the time between April and the time of the Pageant.

As this year draws to a close, each member feels that it has been one of the most successful periods of the Guild's existence and that the success has been due to the efforts of our most able sponsor, Miss Lucas.

Los Castellanos

PRINCIPIOS del segundo semestre se fundó el círculo literario--social llamado "Los Castellanos". Se compone de unos cincuenta y cuatro miembros activos. Sus tendencias son marcadamente literarias y sus ideas son las de fomentar el interés por el castellano entre los alumnos de La Escuela Superior de Soldán.

Esperamos que el próximo año el club "Los Castellanos" represente alguna comedia o tome parte activa en las diversiones de La Escuela Superior de Soldán.

Adelante Castellanos

!Adelante, Castellanos!
Con tesón y rectitud,
Avanzando en la carrera
De la ciencia y la virtud.
Aunque sea cuesta arriba,
Aunque sea en lid activa
!Marchad, marchad, marchad!
Hacia la sabiduría
Cada día progresad.

Adelante siempre unidos
Como rápido escuadrón,
Sin que obstáculos arredre
Nuestro noble corazón.
Aunque el vicio nos reclame,
Aunque la ignorancia aclame,
!Marchad, marchad, marchad!
Hacia la sabiduría,
Cada día progresad.

Adelante ante vosotros
Expedito podréis ver
Y sembrado de esperanza
El camino del saber.

ROUND TABLE, JANUARY, 1929

ROUND TABLE, JUNE, 1929

The Round Table

HE telephone rang. Sherlock Holmes, the famous detective, took out his pipe, put on a beard, and lifted the receiver.

A disturbed voice greeted him. "Oh!" it gasped, "I wonder if you can help me."

"Of course I can," assured the no less famous relative of May Holmes, the program chairman of the Round Table.

"My daughter," stated the anguished voice, "has disappeared. It is half past four and she hasn't come home from school yet."

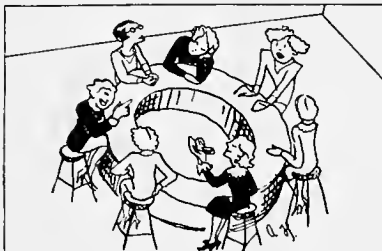

The sleuth looked at the calendar. It was Friday. He asked if the daughter was a student at Soldan and found that she was a third termmer there.

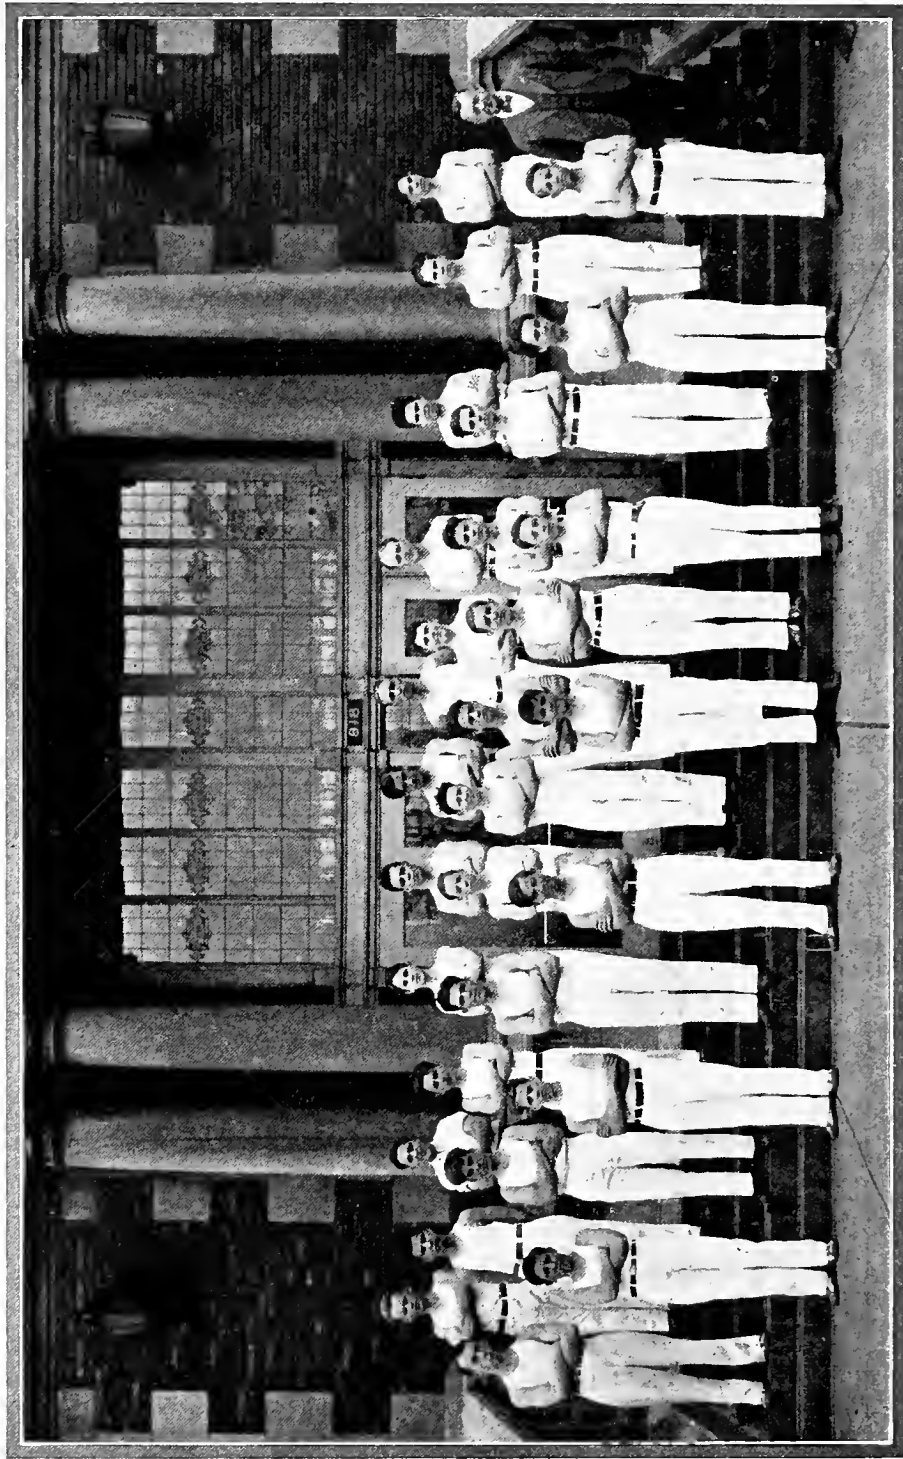

"Did your daughter have an eighty per cent average in English last term?" he asked. Upon receiving an affirmative reply he assured the mother of her daughter's safety and set out with his bloodhound and a make-up box. When he reached Soldan, he disguised himself as a slice of ice-cream and entered the Round Table New Jay party in the little gym. He barely escaped the treasurer, who was serving. He saw Miss George, the sponsor, Margaret Lovell, the president, and Gertrude Landesman, who were presiding over the games being played. His expectations were fulfilled when he recognized the object of his search. He knew that many eligible girls are attracted to the club that is so active in both literary and social activities at Soldan—the Round Table.

HOOPEE! Hot Dog! I got it!"

"What's the matter? Is he hurt?"

"Oh no, he just got a trick he's been practicing for weeks."

—This is the sort of discussion one ususally hears in the big gym while the Gym Club is training.

Under the capable leadership of Dr. Koenig, the club has just finished a very successful term. It has given several performances in the "aud", and, early in the term, was given a part in the Pageant.

The Gym Club meets each Friday at 3 o'clock in the big gym and puts in an hour and a half working on the horizontal bar, parallel bar, horses and mats. In this way the boys train themselves to meet every emergency.

Under the leadership of its officers and the coaching of Dr. Koenig, the club is working hard to perfect its performances, and is striving to make the Gym Club one of the best of its kind. The officers for this year are:

The Chess Club

F the origin of chess little is known. Like the paternity of Homer, it has been a bone of contention to many. Claims have been made for the Chaldeans, the Arabians, the Persians, the Greeks, the Chinese, and for many others. The game has, therefore, a rich historical background both in legend and in fact. One of the first books printed in England, the first printed with metal type, was "The Game and Playe of Chess" published by Caxton in 1474.

If you should pass Room 305 some Friday afternoon, you would probably be somewhat surprised to see a group of boys apparently concentrating on the difficult art of thinking. However, do not report them to the office; they are engaged in a perfectly legitimate activity; in other words, they are attending the weekly meeting of the Chess Club.

This organization has for some time been trying to put this particular form of mental acrobatics on an interscholastic basis. Last term a team from Soldan defeated a like team from Beaumont by a score of five games to none, and this term it has challenged all of the high schools.

WO years ago the Soldan Camp Fire Girls organized under the sponsorship of Miss Raebel. Their work covers every phase of a girl's life and means more than a weekly meeting. Every camp-fire girl tries to make the best use of her opportunities and works for honors in the following crafts: home, nature, business, citizenship, health, hand, and camp. Every term the girls center their attention on some particular form of work, and this term such applied arts as Batik, Leather Modeling, and Tied and Dyed Work are in order.

Athletic Victories of Twenty Years

Basketball

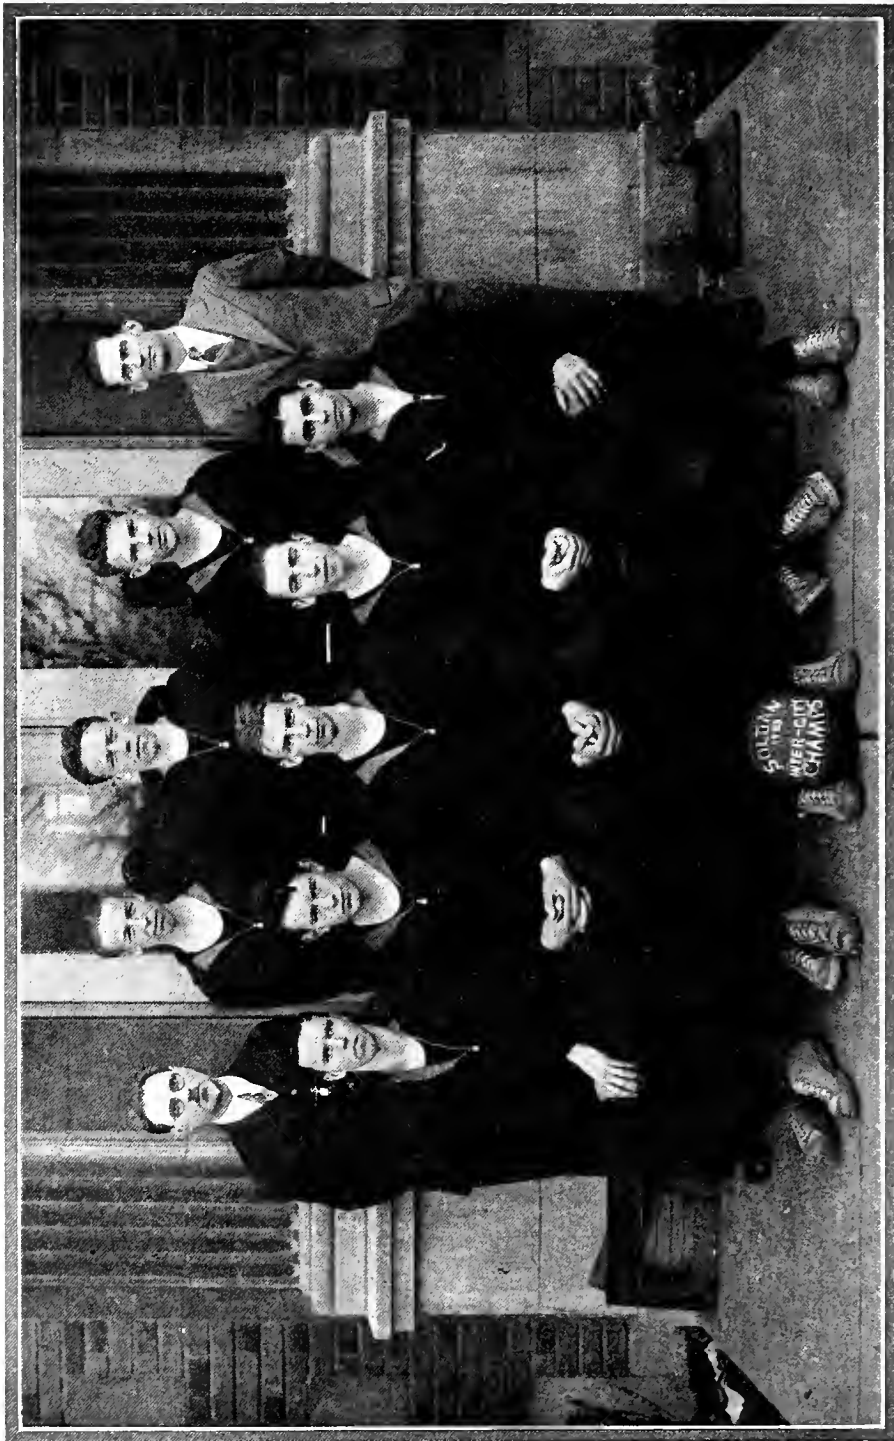

OLDAN'S basketeers have always practiced under adverse conditions because of the size of the home court and because of the necessity of playing league games on the courts of adversaries. However, in spite of this evident handicap, Soldan has always made a fine showing in interscholastic competition and this year, not only downed her opponents in the city league, but went on, taking two post-season games from Crane Technical High of Chicago, thus clinching an intercity championship in the first games ever permitted by the St. Louis Board of Education with a school outside a radius of twenty-five miles.

After great efforts during the past eight years, Soldan at last won the city championship from Roosevelt by a score of 32-20. This game was not the decisive one; it merely left Soldan and Roosevelt tied for first place. But with our defeat of Central and Beaumont and Roosevelt's second defeat at the hands of the fast Beaumont quintet, our title to the championship was left without grounds for contention, thus assuring us a leg on the coveted Michigan Cup.

This year, after the close of the regular season, Soldan, for the first time in the history of the St. Louis Public High School League, competed with a championship team from another city.

In the first game, played at Roosevelt before a rather small audience, Soldan defeated the Chicago basketeers in a game featured by a close defense by both teams. The game was rather slow; especially at the beginning, when Soldan made the first score, only to be passed by her opponents on a field goal and a free throw. The lead alternated between the two teams until the half, after which, although tied several times, Soldan was never passed by the visitors. Chicago threatened considerably on a first play from under our basket which was productive of several field goals, but the home team, after studying it for a short while, effectively broke it up. In the third quarter, Frohardt and Buchele were substituted for Levy and Gelber, to give the two forwards a rest, and made a fine showing in their attack and defense. Crane Tech, during the last period, realized the futility of attempting to pierce our defense and resorted to long shots but failed to even the score and the gun ended the game with the score 23-21 in our favor.

Previous to the departure of our team for Chicago for the return game of the series, an assembly of the entire school was held in the auditorium on March 27th at the eighth hour to celebrate the winning of the Michigan Cup. Before an enthusiastic gathering, Captain Bob

BASKETBALL CHAMPIONSHIP TEAM, 1929

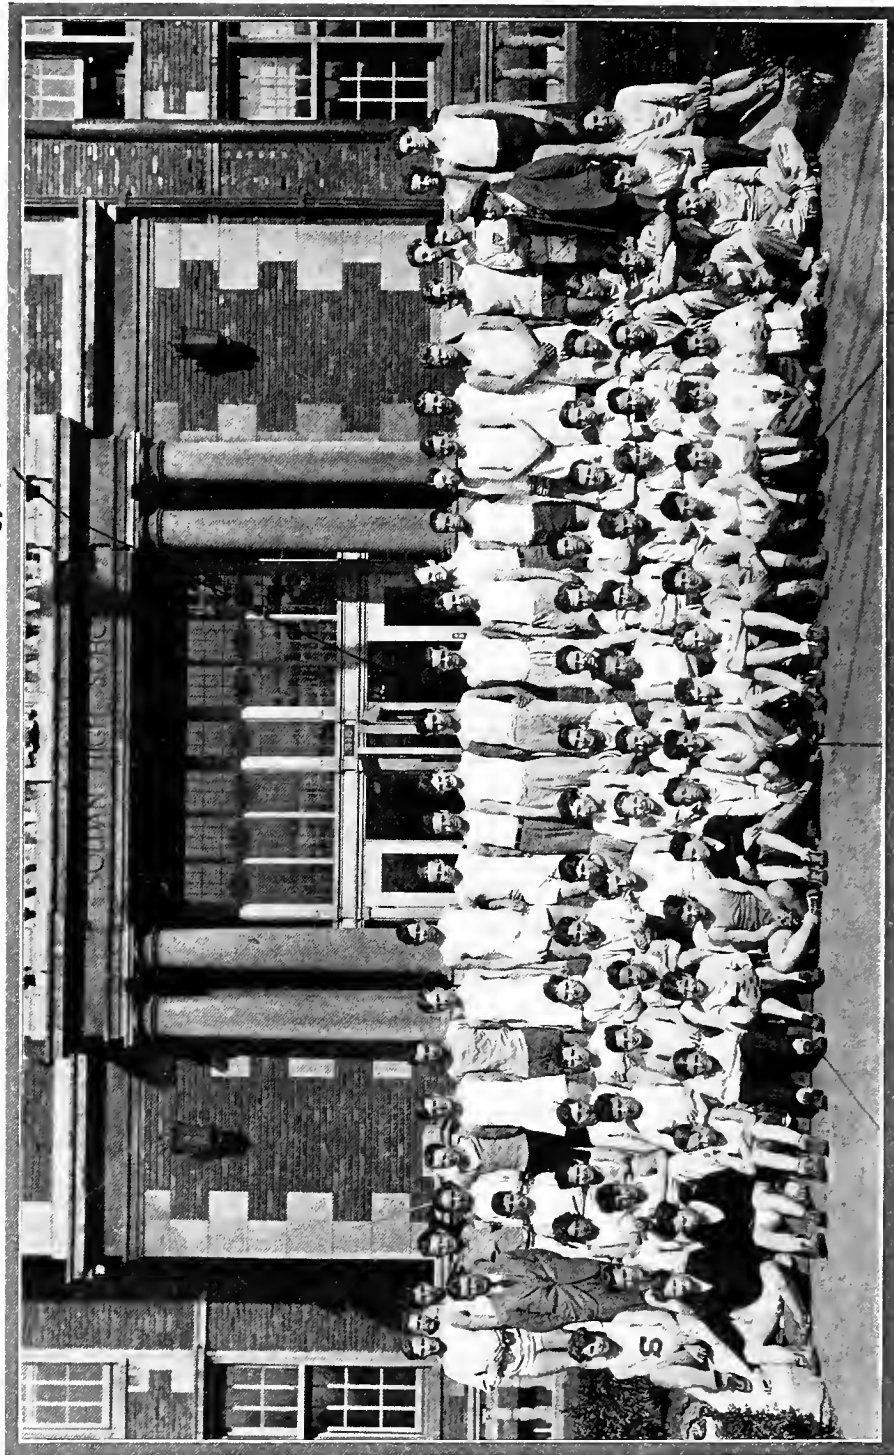

Joyce received, on behalf of the school, the trophy presented by the president of the Michigan Alumni amid much cheering on the part of the students. On the following day, the team left with the hearty congratulations and support of the students and principal.

The return game at Chicago was a duplication of the one here, Soldan winning from a team which, for two years, had not been defeated on its own floor by a score of 28-24 in one of the fastest and finest exhibitions of basketball ever witnessed in a high school clash. This victory clinched the intercity championship. The game was fast throughout, Soldan playing a great game in the first half and better still in the second. A crowd of 1500 saw the game.

At the half, Crane led by a score of 9-6, but Soldan came back in the third and fourth quarters to deal a death blow to Chicago's hopes for victory. Soldan worked up to a lead of 17-11 and, in the last quarter, let loose the fireworks which practically swept Crane off her feet, and scored so rapidly that it was difficult to record the shots. Gelber scored five field goals and two free throws and Hellmich followed close with five field goals, making a total of twenty-two points for these two players. The first half was featured by fine defense on the part of both teams, Chicago using the zone style of play while Soldan resorted to the five man defense. From the beginning of the third quarter, Soldan held to the offensive, keeping the tension at a high pitch throughout the half. Both teams gave all they had and there was not a dull moment of play. In the last quarter Soldan unleashed a brand of brilliant passing which enabled Gelber on the receiving end to sink four field goals. Hellmich's single tally after this streak was the end of our scoring except for a free throw by Buchele late in the last period. Crane retaliated with a sweeping attack but the gun ended the game before Soldan's large lead could be overcome.

Coach White and the squad are to be praised for the wonderful season just concluded and there was not one of the boys who did not contribute magnificently to our victory. Hellmich, at center, was always a great factor in the offense by reason of his ability to secure the tip-off with such consistency. Levy and Gelber, our leading scorers, did splendid work at forward. Cook and Joyce were towers of strength in the defense, and Frohardt and Buchele showed up very well in their play. Six of the eight boys who played this year graduate in June. But we look forward to another championship team next year built around the nucleus of this year's stars by the willing cooperation between the coach, squad, and student body. With such assets we cannot fail to be a factor in the play of the next interscholastic basketball season.

TRACK SQUAD

Track

HIS most ancient of sports, the pastime of the ancient Greeks and later of the Romans, has been handed down to the present age in practically its original form. The Marathon or relay, in which a flaming torch was carried by the Grecian youths over many miles without allowing the torch to be extinguished, is retained in our present relay teams, except that a baton takes the place of the torch and the distances covered are much shorter. The discus throw, javelin, and other forms of outdoor sports were ardently pursued with the greatest zest, the reward generally being a laurel wreath which was placed upon the brow of the victor, or lumps of the comparatively scarce ore, coal, which was given on special occasions. Our impressions of the ancient Greeks are always associated with track and its allied sports, which always held a high place among the ancients.

Track has since then suffered considerable deterioration, but now great interest is again being shown in this sport. Its value is being more widely recognized, not only as a means of keeping physically fit but also for the splendid training it offers in the coordination of mind and body.

Soldan shares in this enthusiasm for track and when the call for aspiring athletes comes, our campus is dotted with volunteers, competing with one another in friendly contests of skill in the broad jump, pole vault, sprints, relays, shotput, discus and javelin throw.

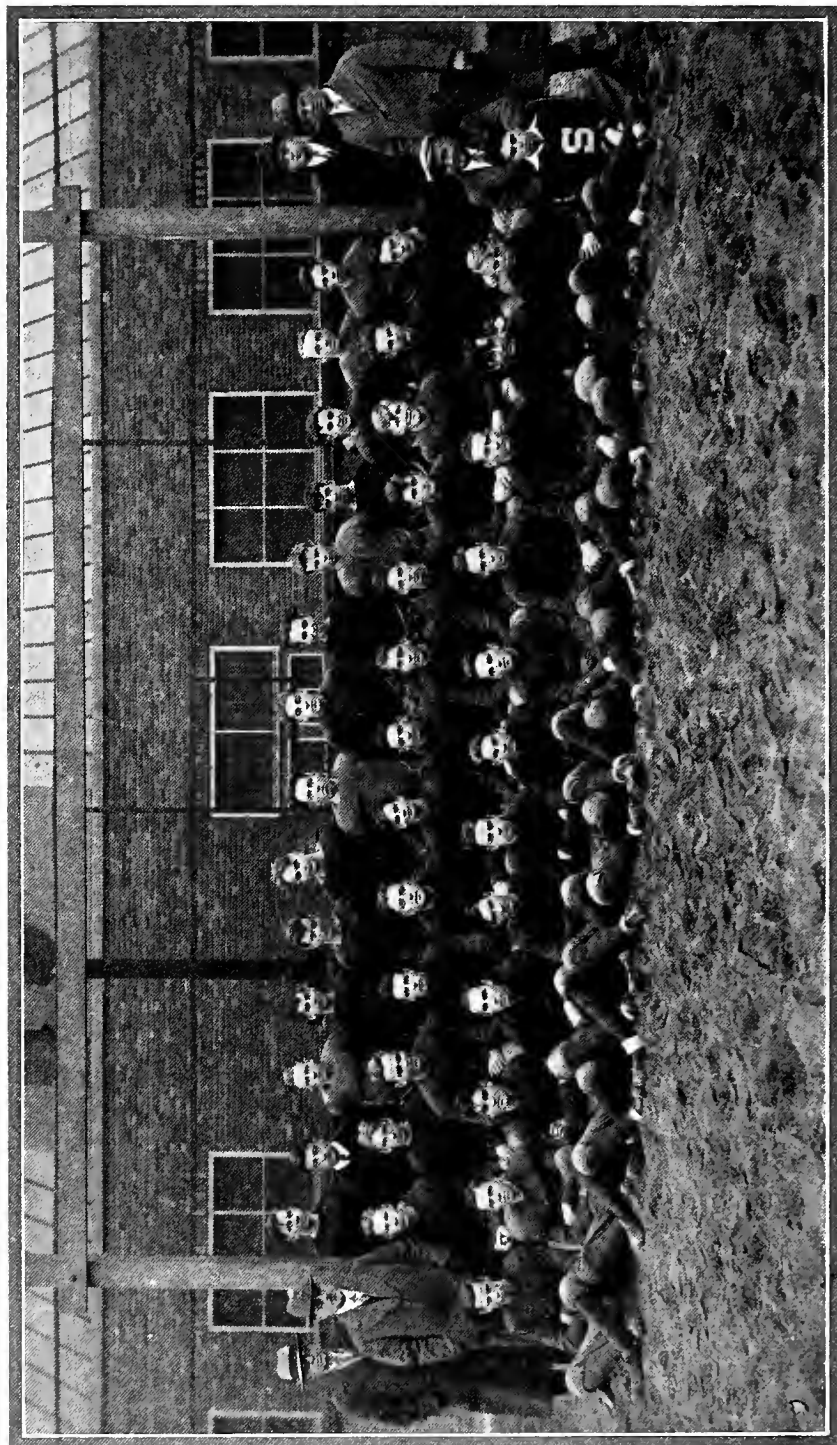

Soldan's track records go back to the year our school was opened, in 1909, and our first interscholastic championship came in 1909. The season of 1916 was of particular interest as we had an exceptionally strong junior team and a correspondingly weak senior one. Our juniors more than doubled the points of any of their nearest opponents but in spite of this stellar performance we lost the title to McKinley by a score of 64 points to our 60 $\frac{1}{3}$.

In 1919 we had another strong junior team, breaking five junior and one senior interscholastic records. Altogether thirteen records were broken that year, four by McKinley and one by Cleveland; we only finished second. It was in this year that Tom Hennings was captain of the junior team.

Following up our previous good showing, we clinched the championship in 1920 and 1921. In that year the biggest score in the number of points was recorded when Soldan won the meet.

Our other championships came in the years 1925, 1926, and 1927. In 1928 we won the Mississippi Valley Championship.

This spring we look forward to winning the meet in May and with Mr. Plag's splendid coaching and the team's fine cooperation, we can count on being a close contestant for the coveted title.

FOOTBALL SQUAD

Baseball

BASEBALL may truthfully be called "The King of American Sports". Little known in Europe or elsewhere, although it promises to secure staunch supporters in foreign nations, it may be claimed as distinctly American. Originating from the New England town-ball and the earlier schoolboy game of "One Old Cat", it has assumed a decided national character in the United States and in its present form is undoubtedly America's greatest contribution to Sportdom.

Soldan's baseball records go back to the year 1909, but it was not until 1916 that Soldan clinched its first interscholastic victory by running through the season without a single defeat. This team was probably one of the best teams ever turned out by a St. Louis high school.

Following immediately upon this championship came the one of the following year, when Mr. Cook, with only one letter man, whipped into shape a winning combination.

In 1920 the team again came home with the bacon. After having lost the first two games of the season they swept through the remaining games to clinch the title, showing an unusually strong team. This year may be claimed as the banner year of Soldan athletics, for we carried off the championship in every branch of interscholastic sport.

In 1921 we finished second, only to come back the next year with the championship.

Since then, Soldan has had no baseball championship, but we look forward expectantly to the ensuing season, having unusually bright prospects.

Soldan Football

FROM the beginning Soldan has been, each year, an important factor in interscholastic football, sending upon the gridiron a number of formidable teams.

During a period of eight consecutive years, Soldan has not finished lower than second place and in two of the eight seasons (1921-22) and (1925-26) clinched the championship. Previous to these successful years Soldan has wrested the title from her opponents in the years 1913, 1914, and 1919, and finished second in 1918.

Altogether Soldan has won five championships and six second places during a period of sixteen years. The other five seasons brought four third places. This is a truly splendid record and a fine tribute to the coaching of Mr. Cook.

The season just closed is one worthy of great praise for Soldan was, at the beginning of the season, considered "out of the race". However, the desire of the school for a banner year in interscholastic athletics seemed destined to early realization when the team gave every indication of being headed toward the championship.

Built almost entirely from green material by the wonder-working efforts of Coach Jimmy Cook, the team surprised all the critics by sweeping triumphantly through its pre-season schedule without a single score by any of its opponents. These games were a wonderful tonic, through which the team gained badly needed experience under fire, and opened the eyes of everyone to the possibilities of a championship squad.

These first victories were at the expense of St. Louis U. High, Alton High School, and Principia Junior College. High scores were rolled up in each of these games, while our own goal remained uncrossed.

This impressive pre-season record, in which an average score of 26 points a game was attained, was of incalculable aid to the team in its regular league games.

The march of triumph was continued by our defeat of Cleveland by a score of 18-0! This was followed by the defeat of Central, the league's weakest team, and our victory over Beaumont, a light, fast squad. Thus with only one league game remaining to be played the team stood undefeated and unscored upon, while the nearest competitor had been defeated once in league competition.

In the last game of the year the team fell a victim to overconfidence and allowed Roosevelt to score less than a minute before the end of the first half, thus shattering the morale of the entire squad. The men fighting for the Gold and Brown were stunned by the unexpectedness with which their dream of being unscored had been destroyed. The team fought gallantly during the last half but it was unable to push the ball across the final white line before a determined Roosevelt team.

Though many loyal rooters were overwhelmed by this unexpected defeat and the shattering of all championship hopes for this year, the season was highly successful inasmuch as Mr. Cook built from an unpromising array of aspirants a team which not only tied for championship, but was scored upon only once during the entire season.

Dave Cook, quarterback, was the outstanding star, while Shapiro played a smashing game at fullback and instilled his own fighting spirit into the players. Buchele and Shacklin performed regularly at the half-back positions. On the line Minkey and Bray held down the wing berths with Becker and Soest at the tackles. Vanse Wright, flanked by Harowitz and McHenry, was a tower of strength in the center.

The team scored an average of $18\frac{1}{4}$ points for each game, compared to $\frac{3}{4}$ points by their opponents, only one score being made against them of 6 points, and that by Roosevelt.

Tennis

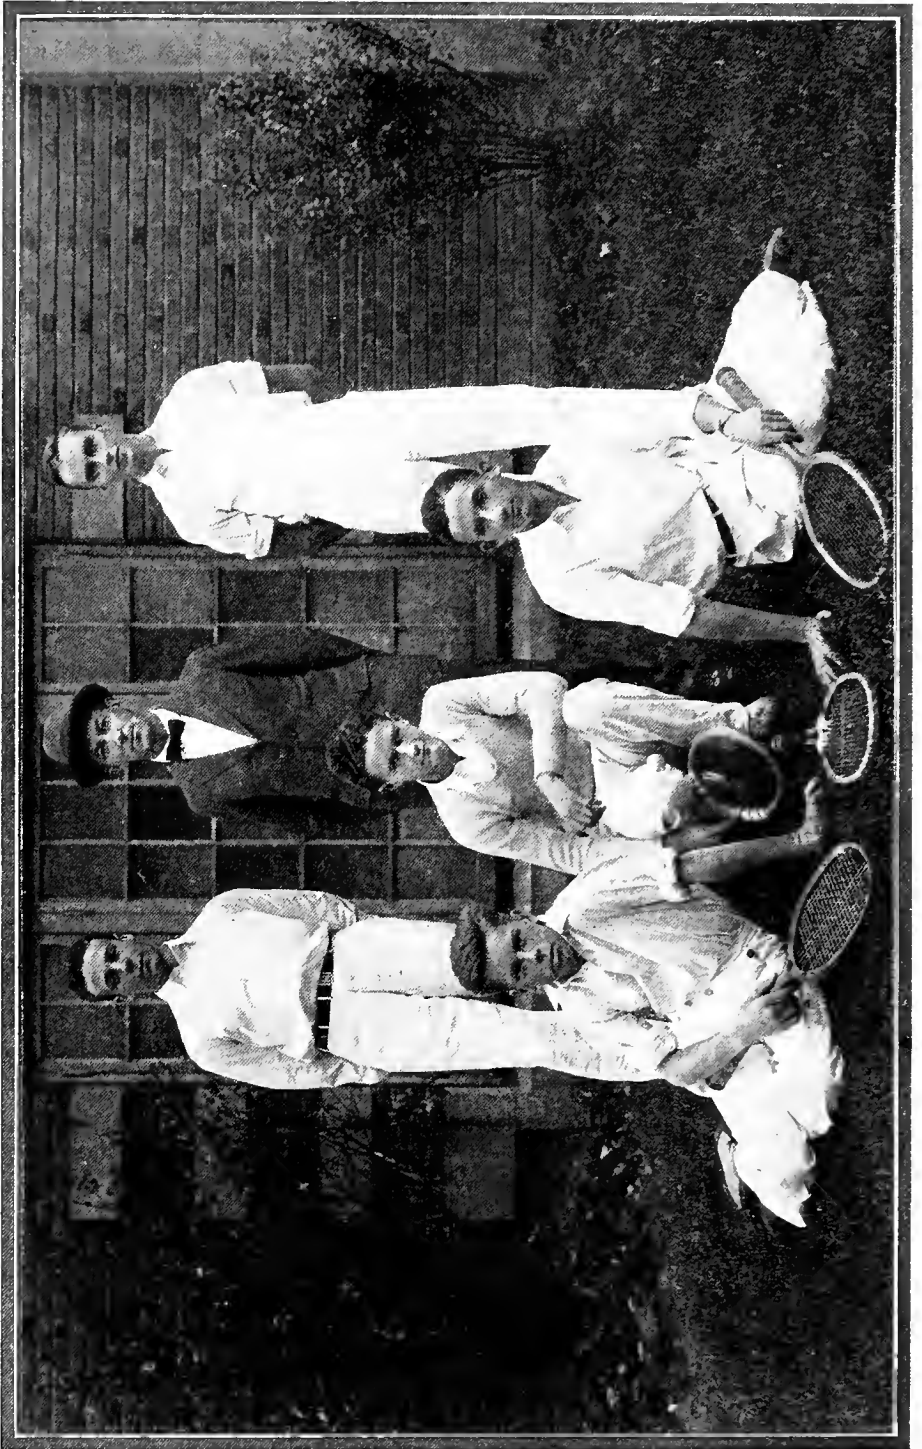

TENNIS may be termed the "dark horse" of athletics. This branch of sport, formerly little known and appreciated, bids fair to become a rival of football and baseball in the hearts of American sportsmen. If the rapid strides it has taken in the last few years can be taken as signs, tennis will, within the near future, be able to compete with baseball in the number of enthusiastic followers.

Soldan formerly had the advantage of the nearness to Forest Park, which enabled the students to participate in this exhilarating sport to a large degree. This fact, while formerly given as a reason for Soldan's tennis supremacy, must now be dismissed since, at the present time, all the high schools either have courts of their own or are closely situated to public parks where the students may practice.

Soldan's interest in tennis goes back to 1914, and since then, our supremacy has been unquestioned. One reason for this superiority has been the trophy donated by the senior class of 1914 for the promotion of tennis. On this cup has been inscribed yearly the name of the winner of the spring tournament held at Soldan. However, the practice of the spring tournament is now being followed by other high schools and the competition between schools has been placed upon a more general basis.

The Soldan netsters have captured eight championships, covering a period of competition of twelve years, and have finished in second place the other four times, a truly remarkable record not equalled by any other school in the city. Coach Plag is to be highly commended for the splendid work he has accomplished in this field. And due credit must be given the willing cooperation of the squads under him which have brought in such a continuous record of victories.

Soldan championships cover the years '14-'15, '18, '19, '21-'22, '22-'23, '24-'25, '25-'26, '27-'28, and preparation is under way now for a '29 victory.

TENNIS TEAM

G. A. A.

THE Girls' Athletic Association was organized March 11, 1910, by Miss Elsa Pohl and it has been one of the most popular of Soldan's many clubs. Early in its history the various activities were sponsored by faculty members and the records tell of Miss Glatfelter and Miss Lomax as basketball coaches; Miss Hoolan and Miss Pierson as gymnastic dancing coaches; Miss Pohl and Miss Sherry as coaches for volley ball.

Since every girl was eligible, the club was forced to limit its membership, because of lack of gym space, to third term pupils, but this only served to whet the enthusiasm of the upper term girls.

In 1921 Miss Higgins became sponsor and a schedule was adopted whereby inter-class volley ball tournaments should be held in the fall, basketball in the winter, and volley ball and tennis left to fill out the spring months.

Every girl is ambitious to win a Soldan "S" or a Missouri "M". Seven hundred fifty points are required for an "S", and 1,000 points for an "M". Points may be earned in the following ways:

Hiking (50), a perfect gym record (25), passing posture test (25), membership in a class team (50), winning ribbons in track events (25-15-10). Mary Logan, president of the association, may well be proud of the number of girls who have been successful winners of letters in this twentieth year of the club's existence.

"M"

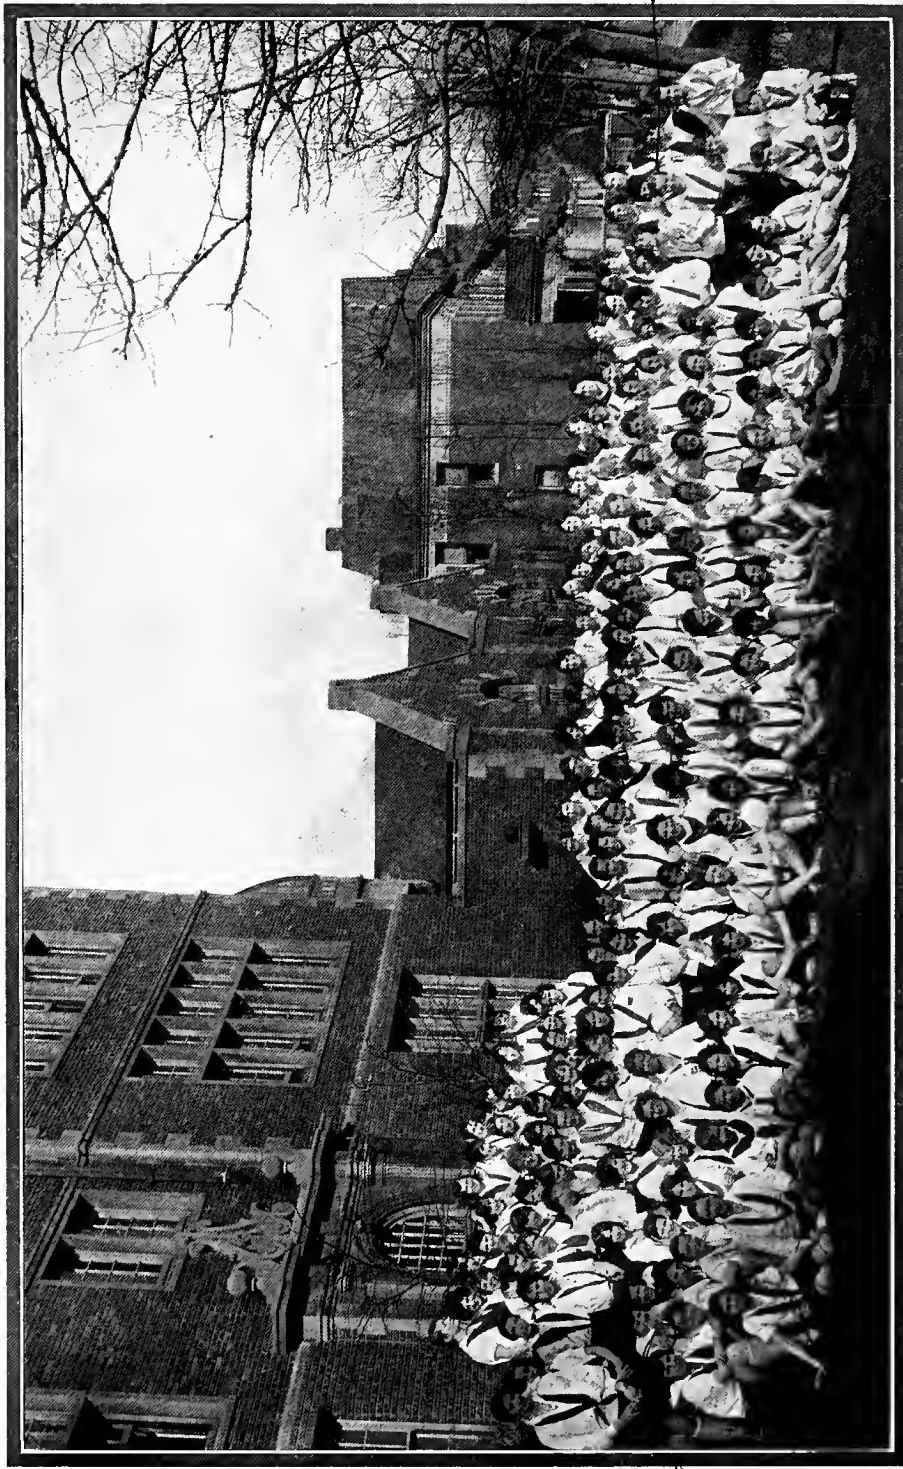

THE coveted High School "M" is offered to all seniors and juniors in high school, on the basis of 1,000 points. General requirements for all candidates are health and absence of any serious physical defects that can be cured, correct posture, scholarship of 80 or above for one year, and good sportsmanship.

In athletics, points are given for hiking, swimming, and track events. Service points are bestowed for unpaid coaching, and leadership. Rewardable student activities are membership in a school Glee Club, Debating Team, or Orchestra. In a school possessing a gymnasium, points are given to those students who are excellent in gymnastics, or to those who learn four major folk dances. Under the head of Games, points are given for performance in ball games, such as football, basketball and tennis.

All candidates for the "M" must have 400 points covering health, posture, sportsmanship and scholarship—that is, the general requirements; 400 credits must be in athletics; the remaining 200 are wholly elective. 1,000 points are absolutely necessary to get that glorious "M".

Meditations on a Bull Dog's Tail

First of all, is the modern bull-dog's tail long enough to meditate on? Of what use to the happy (or unhappy) bull-dog are the few half inches attached to the end of his backbone? Likewise, of what use would a lengthy tail be? Some say a dog keeps his balance with the aid of his tail. That being the case, the reason for a bull-dog's bowleggedness is the shortness of his tail. Just think of the bull-dog having been blessed with such a good natured face, as well as beautiful bowed legs. Why must he go through life with an insult for a tail? A bull-dog's life is certainly a tale of woe.

Mankind having decided to rob the bull-dog of his tail, what happens to the piece left over? It is made into sausage and do we eat it deliciously flavored and mustarded? And—does the butcher, capable of so many crimes concerning dogs' tails, ever get to heaven? What a guilty conscience he must carry about with him loaded down with the ends of tails? Last, but not least, how long would a bull-dog's tail become if it were not clipped and how much sausage does the butcher lose by not waiting until the tails are full grown? Curiosity gets the best of me—why must a dog have such a complicated thing as a tail anyhow?—and thereby hangs another tale.

A Beauty

I looked at her as she went by;
And as her beauty struck my eye,
I turned before she had passed my back,
That not one glance of her I'd lack.

Her movement in itself was grace;
And the look upon her face,
Above all others I had known,
Intelligence and love was shown.

Her eye was bright as bright could be,
And as she passed she looked at me;
Then she turned and walked away,
But my heart with her did stay.

Now she trotted on the field,
With a snort and uplifted heel;
And took her place among the rest,
A racing horse, of breed the best.

Black—!

Jimmy had been following her for blocks. Straight down Olive Street they walked. Each time she stopped to look at an alluring window, he stopped just behind her. He hadn't seen her face, but he was sure it must be of dazzling fairness.

That afternoon Jimmy had set out, somewhat grimly, to have his hair cut, "Why can't fellows have long hair?" he pondered. He could have used that fifty cents for something useful instead of for such a necessary evil, as a hair cut. And then the vision!

She was standing, back turned to Jimmy, admiring a window full of lacy nothings draped artistically on the floor of the window. She would have put the old-fashioned Venus to shame. Small, five feet two, mentally summed up Jimmy, slender, a mere will-o'-th'-wisp. Jimmy said poetically; tiny little feet in the most ridiculously dainty little high-heeled pumps. A slender hand, beautifully gloved, was pressed against the window. Her head was tipped to one side at a saucy tilt. She was dressed in black from the black turban on her head to her black pumps.

"Whew," ejaculated Jimmy. Right then all thoughts of hair-cut vanished. He followed her, shamelessly, purposely, determined to see her face. He pictured her. Green eyes in long black lashes. A little tip-tilted nose. A tender, whimsical bud of a mouth. Skin like new cream with the faintest promise of dawn in her cheeks. And, oh glory of glories, her hair must be auburn with the gold of the sunset in it.

So Jimmy followed her, always just behind her. Now was his chance! No, an automobile stopped him. Now! No, he'd bumped into an old lady. Apologies to be made. Gosh, he'd lost her! No, there she was. Oh! She'd stopped to wait for a car. He hurried forward. Just then she turned to him.

"Oh! Gaspd Jimmy "She's black."

RE

Because of Ice

Here I am, a little insignificant model "T" Ford, tearing my very vitals out racing up these mountain roads in an endeavor to reach Horseshoe first. Well, the others are quite a bit ahead of me, but I can try anyhow. There is another horrible turn, and now we are down off that dreadful Floyd's Hill. Thank goodness! Now that I'm in the valley again I may be able to speed it up a little.

Well, here I am at Bulls-eye Springs where all the fat people in Colorado come to take baths which, for all the good they do, could just as well be taken at home. I guess human beings are silly though; I'm surely glad I'm a car, or what you could call one, if you didn't look too closely. I certainly have been traveling, for there is that powerful truck and that twelve cylinder bus I have been racing. It is too bad they are leaving, for I must stop for something to eat. Oh well, I'll catch them later. Ah! Does that feel good? It surely does; my old tank was nearly empty.

I am leaving town now and here I am on the highway again. Gee! This is tiresome; maybe I'll know better than to enter a silly old race like this again. My, how this hurts! It couldn't hurt any worse if I were being pulled apart by horses—those creatures which we have almost displaced. We're going up that last hill before Horseshoe now and what a noise we are making. I don't think I can make this hill. I suppose I must back down and try it again. I wish they would take that load off my back; it is really getting quite burdensome. Well, I guess this is my last run. It surely makes a fellow seem old to try a stunt like this with everything rattling, wheezing, and protesting. I wonder who will use my gears and works when I am junked. Oh well, here's for another try at that hill. Pull! Pull! Ah, at last I'm over; now here I go racing across this flat valley.

Around this corner I must go, and I must watch this winding road as I make the turn around that immense boulder. Well, well, look there. Why, it's a big snow bank right across the road. Now, how will we get through? I suppose we will have to go across that ice; although it's going to be quite slippery, but if those other cars made it, I think I can too. Here we go!

Goodness sakes alive! Glory be! Eureka! By the great right arm of Hercules, if that isn't those two cars, I'll eat my crankcase! What in the world are you fellows doing here? Why you're stuck in the ice, aren't you? With your weight you never should have tried to cross the ice. Of course you were liable to fall through. Well, well, I guess I'll have to pull you out, but if I do, one of you will win the race. However, if the first one will promise to wait until I've gotten you both out, I'll do it.

Ouch! My, oh my, that almost pulled my axle off, but I got that one out. Now, for the other. There, now you're both out so let's continue the race. It surely is slippery going across this ice, but I seem to be getting along better than the other two. Ouch! I turned completely around that time, but I'm still in the lead. I just missed a pole then. I certainly am lucky today.

Now, I'm on the road again, and I'm traveling along at a clip. Only a mile to go, and if I can hold this lead, I'll win; otherwise it's going to be too bad for little me. Those other cars are on the road, and I'm only a thousand yards in the lead. My, but they are certainly cutting down my lead. Here goes a little more gas; I've got it wide open now so I can't do any better. Anyhow I'll give them a good run for their money and if I lose, I won't cry about it, for I'm going to the junk-yard anyway.

Wow! The finish is only a quarter of a mile away, and they're almost up with me. However, I'm still in the lead and expect to win. Here we are almost as the finish, and would you please look at the people standing alongside to watch the finish. The finish is only five hundred yards away, and that bus is right behind me. There are four hundred yards left. Now two hundred. Now one hundred. Now fifty. His front wheels are even with my engine. Now twenty-five left. OH! He's passing me. No, he isn't, but he's even with my front wheels. Over! Now, to see who won.

The people are calling for one of us; I don't know which one it is, but I'll wait here for I suppose it's the other fellow. It always has been throughout my whole life. I'll wait here and if it's I, for whom they're yelling, I'll soon know it; if it's the other fellow, well, there's no use making a fool of myself by going back to see if I won. Well, what do you know about that; they are yelling for me, and saying that I won because of my crank. I always knew self-starters weren't as good as old-fashioned cranks. What, you want me to make a speech, do you? You want to know why I ran? Well, if that's the case, I'll tell you. Long ago I swore that I'd do something noteworthy on my last run, and, folks, this was my last run. I'm ready for the junk-yard, and I've kept my promise. No, I'm not afraid of the future life. I've lived a good, honest, and humble life and don't expect anything bad. You want to know how I happened to win? Well, do something for someone and you're always repaid. Good-by.

Henry Luedde, 6

If any blond haired boy has left your heart
In forty-seven pieces at your feet
Then don't let your spirits down,
But turn to hair of brown
And perhaps you'll find the same is twice as sweet.

If any light haired man has changed his mind
And left you sinking in the consomme
Calmly smile and let him go
You'll forget about your woe
There's a lot of consolation to be found in hair of gray.

If any light haired boy has passed you by
With his nose uplifted high into the air
Then your heart which seemed quite dead
Will respond to hair of red
And you can sing that song of Tanquays
"I Don't Care".

If any light haired youth who loved you once
Decides that now another's heart he'll win
Don't on mankind turn your back
Run your hands through hair of black
And perhaps you'll find contentment lies therein.

If any light haired boy has turned you down
Alone you'll find some good philosophy;
It may do for you I guess,
But I really must confess
It has never been a bit of use to me.

Twenty Years Back

She rapped the desk smartly. "It is time to come to order, young people. John Powell, will you please put your gum in the waste can? Then you may stand in the corner. Miss Yoffie, it is time to put the dictionary back. What are you doing?"

"I am endeavoring", said that little girl, "to extract therefrom the significance of a few words."

"Don't try to be funny! But young people—" (this remark was cut short when a boy named Roy Holden pulled some rubber bands and, incidentally, a lunch room spoon out of his pocket.) "Roy you are incorrigible! You may go to the office."

"But what was 'at you called me?" asked the unfortunate urchin.

"Never mind. Go to the office at once! John Hall, in the third row, there! What is that you've got?

"Well' uh-er, its' part of a baseball bat."

"Bring it up to the desk. You may sit with the girls, beside Gertrude Shryock."

During geometry, Alfred Davis was working a problem on the board. Susan Sherry raised her hand. "Didn't you leave out the reason in the third step? It ought to be, 'Things equal to the same thing are equal to each other'."

"Well", said Alfred, "I don't think you need to put it in. But I have an ideal!" He soon produced another proof. "There! Isn't that neat?"

"I can shorten that even more," remarked Imelda Carmody. "What did we take algebra for, anyway? And he should cancel more."

She had to leave the room, so Mary Calnane and Francis Patrick vied with one another in seeing who could keep the most people quiet. A girl named Anna Hickey contributed to their efforts by repeating, "Este taciti, si vobis placet."

During Latin, she called on a boy named Layer and he recited quite well, but two hands shot up, "Well, Miss Waney?"

"He didn't say what 'gloriam' depends on. It depends on 'tulerunt'."

"Yes, Miss Cunningham?"

"I always thought 'duco' belonged to the first conjugation!"

"Well, it doesn't." Grace Adams, you may take a ninth hour tonight. I am going to break you of saying 'ain't'. Young people, that is a very bad habit. You are dismissed."

'Tis often said, "The course of true love never runs smoothly". As witness:

The high School Halls were crowded with rushing hunger-maddened crowds, stampeding for the lunch-rooms. A husky good-looking football player ran right into Charlotte, the Campus Flirt, who just happened to be in his way. Bang! went her books. What could Don do but stoop and pick them up? Rising, flushed and angry from the embarrassment and delay, he beheld Charlotte's beautiful brown eyes dimmed with tears, and silently said good-bye to Mexican Ragout.

"D-d-did I hurt you", he stammered, and was angry at himself for losing his manly dignity.

"No-o-o" Charlotte was actually sobbing. "B-b-but I broke my m-mirror and that m-means s-seven years b-bad luck!" Then fearful lest that sounded too artificial, she glanced at Don and was not relieved to see a look of actual disgust on his face, so she commenced to sob louder. "O-oh——"

His First Cigar

Brother John Donald was sitting in an armchair by the fireplace. The roguish lad was planning a merry trick. He was so full of fun. It was only yesterday that he had poured a kettle of hot water down Nursy Gordon's back. The day before, the jolly youngster had hidden Baby Brother Frederick George in the well. Brother John Donald was very clever too, as you probably have surmised. The little chap was but seventeen and he already carried the lantern for the Father Dear when he went to feed the hogs, to say nothing of bringing in the paper every morning.

What do you think that Brother John was planning? He was going to smoke his first cigar! What normal youngster does not yearn to taste the sublime flavor of his first weed? The refreshing fragrance, a combination of alum and chlorine, with the odor of amonia, lures every chap from his trusty cigarettes.

That evening, Brother John stealthily crept up to the roof and jumped off, so as to make no noise in descending, for Brother was ever considerate of others' comforts. He bravely stalked into the village saloon and in the presence of all, ordered a Ben Webster Imperfecto. To the amazement of all he lit it! He took a petrefying whiff, and thought that a safe had fallen on him. Still undaunted, he stalked out of the room. His head reeled. He took another puff. The side-walk began to stir beneath him. Another whiff and a tree advanced and hit him in the face.

At last the brave lad reached home, and in the unselfish desire to allow his family's sleep to continue undisturbed, sought sleep behind the barn where Gardener Jones found him a few days later. Gardener Jones, the crafty fellow, knew what had happened. Had not Father Dear done the same thing when he was a lad? After unsuccessfully attempting to awaken Brother with a sledge hammer, the faithful gardener massaged Brother's head lovingly with a grass roller, whereupon Brother awoke.

On his recovery, Brother John Donald vowed never to touch another cigar — restricting himself to chewing tobacco.

More Mischief

"Oh, go ahead. Don't be afraid," challenged Edith. She had dared me. Was I to let that go, and be called a coward? No, not while everything seemed to be in my favor. I glanced around the spacious class room. Everyone was busy.

At the front of the room sat the teacher. She was at work and surely unaware of the mischief being planned in the back seats. Should I or should I not sneak from the room as my chum had dared me to do? Would I or would I not be caught in some undesirable position? And if so what would my penalty be? Just what would others think? How would the awful predicament end? And, after all, I would be to blame. However, in spite of all these forethoughts and in spite of all I could see in the unpleasant future, I accepted the dare, and glanced around the room once more. Then carefully I slipped from the seat onto the floor, and on my hands and knees started for the swinging door. Now I was near enough to reach it. Out went my hand followed by a hefty shove. The door remained closed. Again I pushed, but it was all in vain.

I turned around and looked at Edith. Her face was a ghostly white; her eyes were glassy. She gazed at the glass at the top of the door. I turned quickly and again pushed the door without success.

There was a bang! I fell backwards and in walked a stately man. It was the principal; I gasped for breath, trying to think of something to say. And then rubbing my hand across the floor I began, "I've lost — some — of — a — a — bar pin around here on the floor." He had not even listened to me. Explaining was beyond his hearing. I arose from the floor. Then in a deep voice he called to the teacher in front of the room, "Pardon me, Miss Brown, if you don't mind I am going to take this girl with me."

"Certainly! Certainly! go right ahead," came the obliging teacher's reply.

As I walked from the room down the hall, I could see my father conversing with the principal, my mother talking with my father, and my expulsion slip written in red ink. Many times at home before, my father had given me lectures concerning my conduct at school. Now, how could I face him again? What would he say to me? Would he put me to work with so little education?

When we reached the principal's office, I became more nervous than before. We walked in. All this time he had been very quiet which was much to my liking. He walked across the room to his desk. I followed slowly. Gathering some papers, he turned and demanded, "Kindly take these notices to all the rooms on the first floor. It won't take you long." I took the notices, and as I walked down the hall I decided I was not so unlucky after all.

Saved by the Bell

(A One Act Play)

Scene: Schoolroom.

Time: Anytime.

Characters: Trig. teacher, Victim I, Victim II, Villian, and other unfortunates. (Victim I enters to find teacher glowering at class).

Teacher: Well, why so late? Didn't you hear the bell?

Victim I: I-I was just washing up after gym, sir.

Teacher: Cleanliness is next to godliness. Come here. Have you an assignment after school?

Victim I: No, sir.

Teacher: You're mistaken. You have. See me here after the bell rings. (Victim protests).

Teacher: I don't care to argue the case. (To class, that is, to other unfortunates, many of whom sit about in postures of defense, trembling with fear). Yesterday we were studying the laws of sine, cosine, and tangent. You (pointing to Victim II) go to the board and present the geometric explanation of the law of sines.

Victim II: I don't believe I can, sir.

Teacher: I don't care for any discussion. Go to the board. (Victim obeys). Can't you even begin the figure?

To class: Now that's what turns a man's hair gray. That fellow shows not a glimmer of common sense. Uncommon sense it should be called. (Laughs loud and long at his own pun while the class manage a few faint snickers).

Victim II: By the formula, $\sin A + \sin B = 2 \sin \frac{1}{2}(A + B) \cos \frac{1}{2}(A - B)$. Substituting for further proportion —

Teacher: Now what are you doing? Really, when you had a whole night in which to do this. (The class out of sympathy for the Victim prevaricate beautifully).

Class: But our assignment didn't cover that, sir.

Teacher: obviously embarrassed: Sit down.

Villian a studious youth who always does his home-work: I think I can do it, sir. I studied it last night.

Teacher: There! There's a man who will make something of himself. (Working himself into a frenzy). The only one in the class, I'll wager, who put in a full four hours on his home-work. (With fiendish expression on his face he approaches Victim II. Phone rings and he answers it before doing violence to trembling Victim.). Hello! What? Today? Surely! I'll be there in a few minutes. Good-by. (To class): School is dismissed for the rest of the day. (Glances at Victims I and II who stand white-lipped and gawking before him. He reaches for a shotgun in a corner) You two had better get out of here as fast as you can. I can't be bothered now. I'm going hunting.

(Curtain)

Thunderous applause is heard in all parts of the auditorium.

And dreadfully mussy
But for all that you simply adore?
He's terribly tumbly—
Sometimes even grumbly
When he falls on the hard kitchen floor.
His playthings are scattered,
His coat mud - be - spattered,
As he comes like a gust through the door.

Of course he's a trouble—

Joy bursts like a bubble

When you see him preparing a roar.

Yes, your brains don't need racking,

But in life you are lacking—

If you haven't a brother—aged four!

Mrs. Bailey had been kind enough to bring three year old Walter a box of candy. His mother kept it for after dinner, but she told him about it immediately. Then, swelling with conscious pride, she asked her son: "Now, darling, what do you say to Mrs. Bailey?" "Uh—uh—where is it?"

Mixed Letters

Two envelopes were sealed, addressed and stamped. At last with the assurance that they had been mailed there came to Mrs. Thomas a moment for relaxation. Not since she had planned a birthday party for eight year old Jean had she had a moments rest.

There was always Jean's nagging, "Have you sent an invitation to Mary Roberts and her sister?" And at last Mrs. Thomas could nod to the affirmative.

The day of the party arrived. Mrs. Thomas had requested a dependable colored woman to come and help. But at ten o'clock the woman had failed to arrive. Pitched to the highest state of anxiety, there was nothing left to do but for Mrs. Thomas to start working. Some people might not deem a birthday party for eight year old Jean much trouble; but to prepare lunch such as this for twelve little people required preparation.

The clock struck eleven. Jean tripped down stairs, happily displaying her new organdie dress bought for the occasion. Jean, at a long peal of the bell, dashed to the door. In fact she was ready to open the door before the bell had completely stopped ringing.

"Mother, come quick," Jean cried, as she opened the door.

Mrs. Thomas, drying her hands on her apron, rushed to the hall at Jean's scream. "Whatever is the matter," she exclaimed.

There standing neatly in a row were five little colored children dressed in their best. With smiling faces, red ribbons, and spotted ties, they all in unison cried, "Happy birthday, Jean."

"But, but" stammered Jean.

The eldest stepped up and confronted Mrs. Thomas. By this time five little black faces were puckered up as if trying to hold back floods of tears.

"We thought you had made a mistake and didn't mean to invite us, so we just brought our invitation with us."

A much astounded Mrs. Thomas took the invitation. At last she could understand why neither the Robert's children nor the colored woman had come. Could she send them home and spoil everyone's day? She had prepared for twelve. Why not ask them in? This she did. By twelve o'clock the others had arrived. Mrs. Thomas fixed a table for Liza's children in the bedroom and Jean and her friends ate on the dining room table.

At four they all left, tired but happy. Liza's children were full to the bursting point. Jean admitted that it had been a most wonderful birthday. The only thing left undone was to straighten out the matter of the Robert's children. That was quickly done over the phone.

Mrs. Roberts said, "I admit I couldn't imagine why my girls were not invited to Jean's party; but then when I received a letter from your asking me to come and work, of course I was most indignant. But that's all explained now".

"Good-bye," Mrs. Roberts said, "I'll pay more attention to my letters next time."

Moral: Don't let your letters go astray You'll be in a fix yourself some day.

Smiles

The flowers are the smiles of the world.

Who knows?

Perhaps when one kindly smiles,

There grows

A flower somewhere on earth—

A rose

Or violet lifts its bashful face

To view—

I think that one should always smile,

Don't you?

But when one frowns an ugly weed,

'Tis said,

Somewhere upon the earth uplifts

Its head.

With thorns and brambles then the way

Is spread.

The path is blocked, one must begin

Anew.

I think that one should never frown,

Don't you?

Success!

It was the night before her first appearance! A luxurious bath followed by a restfull nap in front of the fire; her costume was polished, her ribbons were laid out, and thus her preparations were completed.

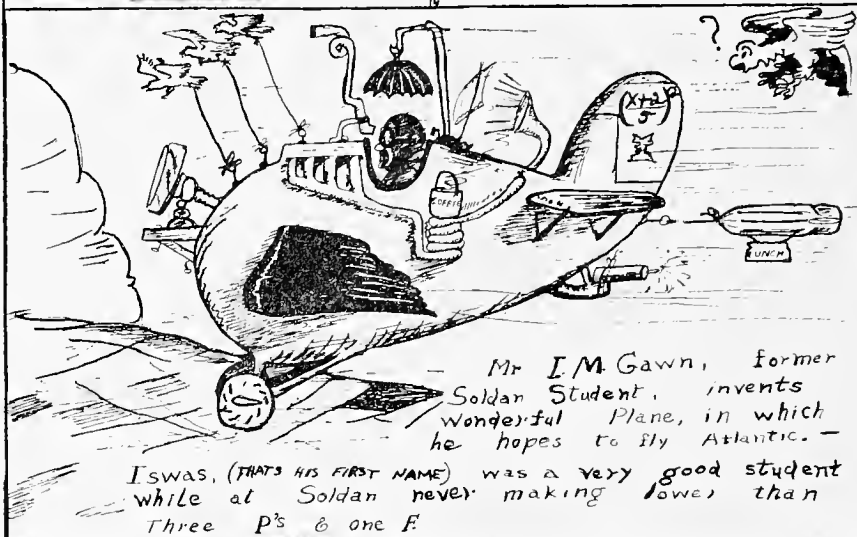

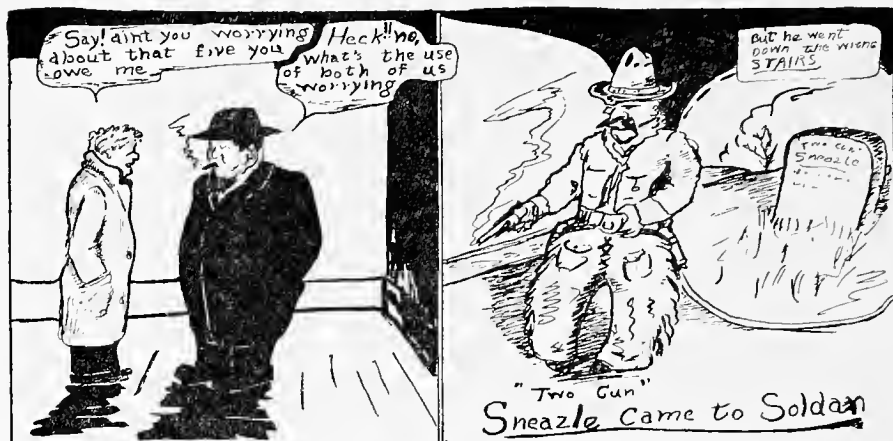

The next day was clear and crisp, and she decided to walk to the performance. It gave her courage, and her bowed legs grew much steadier as she hurried along. Arriving backstage she was graciously received by her fellow-actors, and then she retired to her dressing room.

"I just adore him—I can't live without him!"—there was her cue, and she ran to the center of the stage masquerading as "Dick", the "other man" in the Soldan Christmas play.

But it was just my ugly little Scottish terrier dressed in a shining harness tied with a large red bow.

The younger generation makes "Hey, hey!" till the sun shines.

All the corridors were silent,
Every boy was acting right,
I suppose you kown the reason—
Mr. Holden was in sight.

Did you ever watch the camp-fire
When the wood has fallen low,
And the ashes start to whiten
Round the ember's crimson glow,
With the night sounds all around you
Making silence doubly sweet
E'en the full moon high above you
That the spell may be complete
Tell me—were you ever nearer
To the land of heart's desire
Than when you sat there watching
All those pictures in the fire?

Again he was in Its power. For days It had pursued him. Never could he escape It. It was with him at home, at play, and especially at school. In the class room, It was always beside him. Its web was drawing closer and closer around him, folding him in, stifling him. Already he could feel the slimy grip of Its hand. He might escape It for a moment, but not for long. This time he was doomed, he could not escape It. He knew this by his seventh sense—common sense. Nearer and nearer It came. He could feel Its hot breath on his neck. He saw It and was powerless. What a horrible thing and he was in Its power. It was a ninth hour.

"Elmer Killed—"

"Western Union, Tel-l-l'gram!"

As the above announcement was followed by a prolonged ringing of the door-bell, Miss Prissy Mabell, spinster, seamstress, and ardent church worker, became so excited that she laid down her sewing, took off her spectacles, wiped and replaced them on her nose. Now this was certainly a sign of excitement, for never before in her well-ordered life had Miss Prissy removed, much less wiped, her spectacles before eight o'clock in the evening.

However, having expressed her emotion in this highly boisterous manner, Miss Prissy arose and went to the door herself, it being the maid's day off. Oh yes, Miss Prissy kept a maid; "I don't have to sew," she often said, "Uncle Ezra saw to that in his will." "He", she would add, wiping her eyes fervently, "was a good man."

To return to the waiting telegraph boy.

"Tel'gram for patty ' name of Mabell," he announced brightly, methodically taking a chew at his chewing gum between every two words. "Sign here, please," he added, shoving his book toward Miss Prissy, who, not knowing what else to do, signed her name, took the proffered yellow envelope, and closed the door, as the boy gave a final chew before turning away.

Settling her glasses more firmly, Miss Prissy very carefully read the address on the envelope. It read, "Mr. John Mabell, 11 Elm Street, F — —, Mo."

With a quivery sigh of relief, Miss Prissy sank into a chair, and sat looking at the envelope, trying to decide whether or not to open it. She was relieved because Mr. John Mabell was her brother, who was a business man and received telegrams every day. So this was for John, sent to Miss Prissy, who also lived on "Elm Street," by a girl immersed in dreams of John Gilbert.

"Well," said Miss Prissy to herself, "I'll just open it and read it to him over the 'phone. There's no sense in trying to call that boy back and it may be too important to wait." (Miss Prissy had a secret reverence for anything connected with any of the highly complicated modern business concerns.)

So Miss Prissy opened the telegram. The first words she read were, "Elmer killed —"

Now Miss Prissy was a kind-hearted woman, so she decided to "break it gently." Not stopping to read the rest, which she was sure consisted only of details, she folded the paper, replaced it, arose, 'phoned for a taxi, put on her hat and coat, tucked the telegram in her purse and walked down the steps to the sidewalk to wait for the taxi, all in the course of three minutes. When the taxi arrived, she stepped in it and ordered the driver to take her to the State Bank Building as quickly as possible.

When she arrived at the building, she immediately took the elevator up to her brother's office, thereby becoming the object of not a little comment as to her sanity. For she did make a rather startling picture, as she stood, her hat on backwards, one hand clutching her purse tightly, the other just as tightly clutching the arm of the operator. Nevertheless, she did manage to reach the office of "John Mabell Realty Co.," on the sixth floor.

After receiving with maidenly primness her brother's hearty kiss, she took a seat and said, "John, please sit down."

"Why?" he inquired.

"Just, just because, well, I have some bad news to break to you."

"All right. I'll take it standing, if you don't mind. What is it? Was your house robbed?"

"No, no, of course not. It—it's, well, it's a telegram." "Well, give it to me."

Slowly Miss Prissy drew the telegram from her purse, while she explained, "It's about your brother-in-law, out in the country, uh, Elmer. He—well, here".

Mr. Mabell calmly unfolded the piece of yellow paper and just as calmly read it. He didn't faint, he didn't even go pale. In fact, he laughed.

"What's bad news about that, Pris?" he exclaimed. "Sounds good to me. Are you going?"

"Good news! Am I going! What are you talking about, John Mabell?"

"Why this telegram. Here, read it again, and tell me what is such bad news."

"I-I didn't read it all," quavered Miss Prissy, as she took it. She read:

"Elmer killed three turkeys. Want you to come for Thanksgiving dinner and bring family and Prissy. Wire reply."

Did Miss Prissy go? Of course she did. And among others in the large party there assembled she met Mr. B. Babley, bachelor millionaire, who—

But, as Mr. Kipling so aptly puts it, "that is another story."

A Wet Joke

"Take one knife in each hand and sit on the ground. Put your feet out in front of you. Now! I am going to pour this water right here between your knees and wipe it up before you can cut me with these knives. Here goes!"

I took a handkerchief from my pocket and stooped over. "Mill" was staring intently at the water, his knives held ready. Quickly I grabbed his ankles and dragged him through the water.

He arose very red-faced amid the laughter of the whole troop.

His Waterloo

Mrs. Wadsworth stood on her back porch, calling the absent watchdog. Mrs. Wadsworth was a typical Illinois farmer's wife; short, neither fat nor thin, with brown skin, a pug nose, protruding teeth, and hair cut very short all around—not to say that all Illinois farmer's wives have pug noses and protruding teeth!

Mrs. Wadsworth alternately raised her shrill voice and uttered a feeble whistle, trying to cause Napoleon, the aforesaid dog, to make himself evident.

"Oh, Nap-Nap-here Nap-Nappie, Nappie, Nappie! Shoot that dog, somebody! Napoleon!"

There could be heard a series of muffled barks, as though from a distance, (though to keen ears they might have sounded close). Mrs. Wadsworth sighed and turned back into her kitchen, where she was churning the smooth pale-golden butter that helps to make a visit in the country a delight.

"Blessed if he isn't chasing rabbits again. If he knew I had some meat scraps here, he'd be whining and fawning all over the place!"

She dropped her dasher and ran to comfort Alexander, the baby, who was crying over a cut finger. Dire forebodings ran meanwhile through her mind, and she remembered several of Napoleon's warlike feats when he was presumably chasing rabbits. Once he had killed Dr. Smith's favorite cat. Another time he had caught a skunk and had come home so completely saturated with the glorious "pole cat" odor that Mr. Wadsworth threatened to put a bullet through him to end it all—at least, to end Napoleon if not the odor.

Evening came and Nap did not. Mr. Wadsworth returned from the fields, put up the team, watered the stock, milked the cows, ate supper—farm problem: from whence cometh our next supper?—and still Napoleon was absent, and did not come, though Mr. Wadsworth exerted his powerful lungs to call him.

At midnight Mrs. Wadsworth awoke and raised herself on her elbow to peer out into the sweet darkness of the summer night. Then she nudged her husband in the region of the floating ribs.

"What is—what—what's matter . . ." he inquired.

"Oh, Ethelbert, wake up!" pleaded his wife.

"I asked you—what's matter—what—"

"Listen, Ethelbert Wadsworth. I heard Napoleon barking as if there were a thief in the chicken house. Ethelbert!"

"Don't call me Ethelbert—call me Bert—call me—hey! What did you say? A thief?" And Mr. Wadsworth threw off the power of Morpheus and sprang out of bed.

"Great Scott, I hear him barking like a thousand dogs," he continued. "There must be at least sixty robbers in that old chicken house. Why didn't you call me sooner? My land, you'd let your very nose be robbed before you'd call for help!"

"Now, Ethelbert," said Mrs. Wadsworth, tearfully, "don't you start that business. I tried to wake you."

"Well, all right. Get me my shoes. Where's that lantern? Get me my shotgun."

A moment afterwards he was sallying forth like a knight of old.

"Goodby, Clementine. If they kill me, remember I always loved you. My will is in the bottom drawer of the desk on the left-hand side."

And he strode across the back lawn, opened the gate, and struck across the pasture toward the chicken house. But he soon realized that the commotion came from the barn instead, retraced his steps, and fumbled about trying to open the barn door. He picked up his lantern and went cautiously into the darkness of the huge building. The whole roof rang with wild yelps, growls, the neighing of horses, and sharp querulous remarks from the roosting hens.

"Nap! Napoleon! Come here!"

Napoleon uttered a joyous howl of recognition, but did not appear. Mr. Wadsworth concluded that his faithful dog was battling with a robber in the loft. He resolutely hoisted his rifle onto his shoulder, and set down his lantern so as to illuminate the rude stairway that led upward to the loft. The steps were crowded with cackling hens, which the farmer brushed away as he ascended.

Once in the loft, Mr. Wadsworth saw a very singular and surprising sight. The noble Nap lay crouched near the top of the stairway, making futile efforts to descend. But it was impossible. For a large hen was parked on the top steps, and pecked him every time he approached her. Another stood guard over him and made vicious little darts at him every now and then. A band of pullets hovered in the background, doing their share to frighten the poor dog. He was reduced to the most abjectly humiliated state—there was never a more miserable Airedale.

Mr. Wadsworth burst into a huge laugh, but Napoleon looked hurt, so he became serious instantly. Napoleon hid himself under the folds of his masters' long coat and was escorted therein downstairs. Napoleon cringed every time a hen even so much as glanced at him. And never again did he approach, except for the most pressing reason, a chicken or a barn loft. He had met his Waterloo.

Checks, Please!

Howard Saunders had often heard of checkered careers, but never of checkered days. But he understood why they were so rare after he had experienced one. They were too improbable—too ridiculous. Nobody believed him when he told about it after a month in a sanitarium.

In the first place, he began the day wrong by tripping over a checkered rug. At breakfast he was displeased to find his wife was wearing her most unbecoming house dress, a thing of violent blue and red checks. He had an eye for beauty and anything like that disturbed him. So he wasn't exactly an angel when his son approached him soothingly. "Say, dad, give me some money will you?"

"Where's that money I gave you yesterday?" said that gentleman.

"Well, I had to buy some lunch checks."

"Oh, here! Now get out!"

Saunders growled at the janitor for wearing such atrocious checked socks, and swung onto a passing street car, where his eyes were harassed by a large checkered sign. In the lobby of his office building, a slip and fall on the marble blocks of the floor did not improve his disposition any.

At the office he was greeted with, "Oh, Mr. Saunders, how do you make out a check?"

"My dear girl," he retorted, "if you don't know you ought to be fired." The "stenog" subsided, and he proceeded to his desk, where he found, in the morning's mail, a batch of cancelled checks which his wife had drawn without his knowledge. Thus the morning passed gloweringly. At noon he remembered that he was taking a man to lunch, so he jammed on his hat and went out. At the entrance to the hotel dining-room, the check room girl stopped them to levy tribute. Saunders passed her by, but she tendered a white tag to him, so he turned took it and tossed her his hat. After a rather stupid lunch, the two men sat back to smoke, while a waiter hovered nearby with the bill. Now, our hero's pet aversion was paying meal checks so he ignored the waiter. However, his friend was also afflicted with this mental quirk, so Saunders had to pay after all, which of course improved his disposition. At the check room, he fumbled for his cardboard, and then realized he had thoughtlessly stuck it in his hat band. The girl was signally obtuse and ununderstanding, but finally, after doing everything but swearing out a description before a notary, he retrieved his possession and stomped out. That afternoon, his chief bade him try to find a way to check the success of a rival in business. This was, however, discovered to be not in his province, according to the system of checks and balances devised by their efficiency expert. He was absurdly aggravated by a clerk who would indicate the correctness of the items in a list he was proofing with another man by repeating "Check—check—ch—" Howard Saunders, hard-headed business man, rose with a baleful gleam in his eye and made his way to the chief's office, where he declared decisively, "I am returning home early this evening. Good night!"

Once home, to the consternation of his wife he went straight to bed without a word. He felt that if he could "get away from it all," he'd feel better. Sleep came (he had never had insomnia), but with it—dreams. He thought that his hands were tied with checkered calico so that he could not beat off the hordes of checks printed on checkered paper which were descending on him, urged on by a check-room girl who wore his hat with a hat-check displayed on the band.

The next morning's paper carried the regrettable news that Howard Saunders, stricken with a nervous breakdown, had entered the Hilldale sanitarium.

Sammy

"Sammee—Sammy! Where is that boy? I wanted him to take this pie to grandmother's. Samme-e-e-e!"

"Aw! Jest a minute fellers; I'll be back." And Sammy emerged from the club house over on the vacant lot.

"Sammee-e-e-e!"

"Aw-heck! I'm a'comin', Maw, can't you see I'm a' comin'?"

"Well, it's about time you answered.

Here, take this pie to grandmother's and hurry. It's a surprise and I want her to get it before it cools off."

Sammy took the pie and went down the back steps and slowly up the alley.

"Sammee-e-e! Can't you go just a little bit faster?" Sammy quickened his pace until his mother, satisfied that he would deliver the pie still warm from the oven, went back into the kitchen.

Then he sauntered along as leisurely as if the pie would be warm a week from then. "Gee whiz! Why do they always haffer be disturbin' a feller's peace fer? Gosh, ya'd think they'd let ya be—Friday afternoons at least! Crimminy!" And then Sammy remembered that blueberry pie was his only weakness except, of course, Susie Simpson. But his mother made blueberry pies oftener than Susie smiled at him. Besides, Susie had gone out to the country to spend a few days with her uncle. "Golly! Maw said she was spris'n' Grandmaw with this pie so I guess Grandmaw won't be spectin' me to show up anyhow!"

With that thought Sammy seated himself comfortably against someone's back fence. He could smell the pie. Boy! It smelled good. He very gingerly lifted the paper and peered under. There was the delicious blueberry pie—one of those pies that don't hide their contents with a top crust. Sammy poked his forefinger into the steaming mass. "Ouch!" It was still hot but boy—it tasted swell!

At that moment he heard a low whistle. One of the gang was coming. It was Chuck.

"Say Sammy, you're a peach, you are! Swipin' a pie and not lettin' me in on it.

"Swipin' it! Say—my Maw gave me this pie."

"Gosh! How'd ya do it Sammy."

"Aw! They's nothing to it. Jest like trainin' a caterpillar. Let'em know who's boss and fore ya know it they'll crawl anywhere for ya."

"Ya! I had a pet caterpillar onct, cutest lil' feller, but he crawled down my back and gimmie a rash so I had to squash him—but say Sammy gimmie a hunk o' pie—will ya?"

"Sure thing." Sammy dug down into the unknown depths of his pocket for the jackknife Susie had given him for Christmas and cut his chum a generous half of the pie. Both were too occupied to say anything for several minutes—then Sammy, through a swamp of blueberries in and around his mouth spoke: "S' good, ain't it?"

"Sure is!" replied Chuck.

Ignorance was bliss for several more minutes, then —"Hey! you kids. Get away from my back fence. Got a lot o' nerve. Think you smart hookin' pies and eaten'em in my alley, don't cha? Got a good notion to wallop the pair o' yez. Scat! "It was "Tuffy Morton" the bully of the alley and Sammy's worst enemy. Sammy scrambled to his feet as Tuffy hopped the fence and towered angrily above him "Scat ya' brats! Beat it!" Chuck didn't have to be told twice for he was already turning the corner—and then Sammy's knees began to shake.

A short while later Sammy could be seen going down the street with very disorderly hair and an eye rising like mother's bread dough. He slouched along close to the buildings like a whipped puppy dog. He was thinking "Gosh won't ma give it to me? Boy! It's a good thing Susie's out of town—if she saw me now! Ohhh!" And with a quick movement he tried to get closer to the wall and walk faster at the same time for who should he see but Susie Simpson tripping lightly along the other side of the street humming happily to herself. Sammy thought: "Holy mackerel! Talk about yer 'Embarrassing Moments'," and he turned his face to the wall as he quickened his pace. "Why do wimen always hafta be where ya don't want 'em to be?" He clenched his fists and another groan escaped as he heard, unbelievably, "Yoo Hoo! Oh, Sammy."

"It's all over now" he muttered as he looked up and saw her crossing the street to walk with him. " 'Lo Susie, didn't expect you back hardly so soon. What happened?"

"Oh—I can't tell you—besides—you'll know tomorrow!" Sammy looked at Susie in blank amazement. He couldn't even guess what she meant, but then, he wasn't given the chance.

"Why Sammy! I do believe you've been fighting. Oh-ho. Sammee, your eye looks like a nice squashy blueberry pie! Ha—Ha," and she disappeared into the grocery store which they had reached unnoticed to Sammy until then.

"Lordy! Of course it had to be her to see me like this. Gee even my stomach ackes. Oh, why did I eat so much pie. Gee—if Tuffy had to catch us why didn't he do it before I ate so much. Oh! Oh! My tummy, and I'm almost home! All account of a blueberry pie! I'll swear on a stack o' Bibles that I'll never look another pie in the face!" And so a sadly battered and downcast Sammy went up the steps and into the house.

His mother was in the kitchen preparing the evening meal, and with "I don't feel good, maw," Sammy went up to his room. An hour later the door of his room opened and his mother stepped in holding a small plate. "Here Sammy, I thought you might like some pie even if you couldn't eat your supper. Eat your pie and go to sleep. I told you that stuffy clubhouse wouldn't be healthy but you never would listen to me. Good-night."

Peace at last, but oh! There sat the piece of blueberry pie staring him in the face! He turned his back to it and prided himself that he had succeeded in hiding his black eye. Sammy slept that night. Yes, indeed Sammy slept. But when you go to sleep with a stomach ache, a black eye, and a piece of blueberry pie within arm's reach you are most certain to dream, and Sammy dreamed that he was running down a long alley that had no end and close at his heels came an immense pie. The pie had long legs, and arms that stretched out to pull him back but Sammy kept running, running, forever running down the long alley that would never end.

In the morning when Sammy awoke he felt empty, as though something were missing, you know, like a balloon, still hanging from its string after it had been playfully pricked with a pin. Then he spotted the piece of pie. That urged him out of bed and as he dressed he thought he heard muffled voices downstairs.

He met his mother coming up to call him.

"What's all the racket?"

"Oh, hardly anything," she replied, "but there is some one in the parlor waiting for you." So Sammy opened the door to greet his early guest. A group of young folks greeted him instead, with joyous shouts of—"S'prise, s'prise!"

It was Sammy's birthday. What on earth had made him forget? Oh—pie! And here was the gang and even Susie! A happy morning followed with all sorts of fun and nobody mentioned blueberry pies or black eyes. They even shot craps when maw wasn't looking on. At noon she called them to lunch. Sammy was seated at the head of the table with Susie on his right. What was that? His mother was speaking.

"Sammy, your young friend Susie and I have had a nice time planning this all for you. Now for the last surprise. We both thought you would enjoy it better than the usual thing."

With no further words his mother stepped out to the kitchen. She laid the surprise in the center of the table. Sammy shifted his eyes from Susie to the table and there in front of him lay a nice, big, juicy, blueberry pie!

Don, though thoroughly distrustful of Charlotte's motives, was yet courteous as always. He, therefore, set to the task of lecturing on the foolishness of superstition in general, and that of broken mirrors in particular. Presently, Charlotte handkerchief found its way to her eyes, and all the tears were wiped away.

"You're a dear," this with a sidelong glance. "You're so strong and handsome, and you know so much."

Don fell for her then, and with loud boom, too. He was completely captivated. What male does not love flattery?

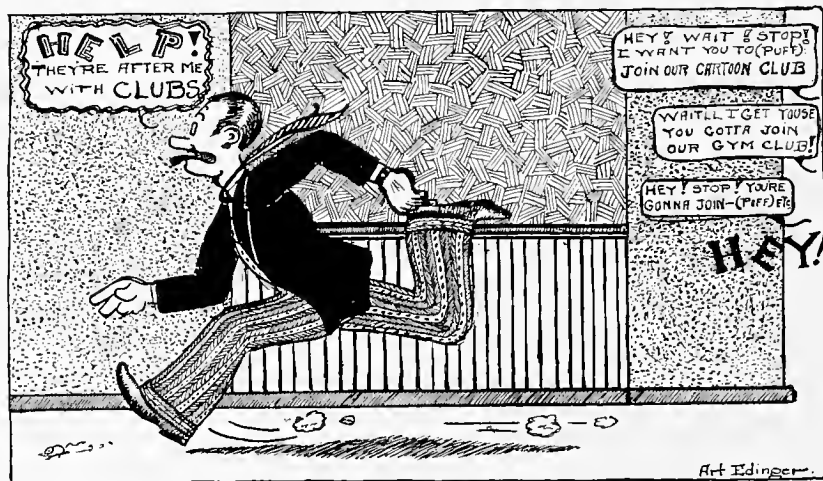

That was the beginning. Each day after that between periods, Don ran to the room where Charlotte had a class, escorted her to her next one, and then ran to his own room. He was sent to the office several times for being late to recitation, but he didn't mind that. At the lunch auds he saved a seat next to him and woe to anyone who tried to sit down there. After school, came that delightful walk home with her. Those blissful nights spent at a movie, or a party. As the football games, the joy in knowing that she was in the stands cheering him; best of all, seeing that touchdown he made when all was apparently against the team.

But, alas, for Don. In the last game of the season, he was injured in the first quarter and taken from the game. His substitute, a handsome young fellow called Bob, performed miracles unheard of in high-school football.

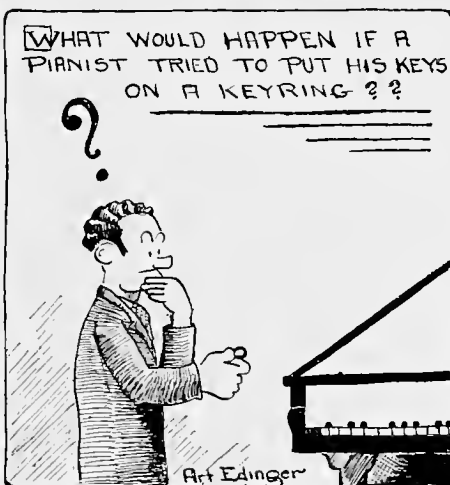

When Don's arm healed sufficiently to permit him to leave his bed and go back to school, he could hardly wait to see Charlotte. His adviser was forced to mention several times, before he understood, that he must go to the office with his excuse. When this fact finally seeped its way into his brain, he arose and went to the office where he had to wait in line. By the time he had attended to, the tardy bell of the first period had rung, and Don must wait until the end of that period to see his beloved. Consequently, at the first tap of the bell Don was out of the door and up on the next floor before Charlotte's class been dismissed. He waited at the door, and had the pleasure of seeing her come from the room smiling, and with hand out-stretched. but—she passed him by, That smile and that hand was for Bob—the miraculous sub.

"Shucks," muttered Don angrily, "That is just like a woman. I'm through with them for life." In the pantomime of washing his hands of the affair, he forgot to watch where he was going, and ran right into Ruth, a darling girl, who just happened to be in his way. Bang! went her books. What could Don do but stoop and pick them up? Rising, flushed and angry from the embarrassment and delay, he beheld Ruth's beautiful blue eyes dimmed with tears—et cetera —

John L. Soest

Sweet Jean, just seventeen, was out for an afternoon stroll. Gee! but how she wished some handsome Romeo would dash up in his limousine and take her for a drive.

Perhaps walking around the block a few times would cause some handsome hero to notice how sweet she was.

Once around the block she walked; twice, three times, five times—This was getting tiresome. Was it really worth all this walking to cause a shiek to notice her?

At last after having completed the circuit of the block ten times she was rewarded. Here was the man of her dreams driving up to the curb in a beautiful red "Hunkajunk" sedan.

"Are you tired of walking, little girl?" purred the double of any collar ad.

"Well, sort of," she lied cheerfully.

"Then try running," called the handsome hero as he sped down the street.

An Interesting Geography Lesson

This incident happened about five years ago in the Walbridge Grade School. The class was having a geography lesson. They were studying about North America and the different zones of the earth. The teacher was asking many questions about the zones and the climate of each. Every one answered the questions correctly and the lesson went on smoothly for most of the hour. Toward the end of the lesson a very funny thing happened.

A girl got up and asked the question, "Have they got posts at the poles so you can tell where they are?"

Then another child asked a similar question, "Because the south pole is in the southern hemisphere does that make it warm?"

Aurealus Justus

I picked up one of those dark brown rough balls about three inches in diameter. It was useless so I threw it angrily at a tree. As it hit, the covering, which was about one fourth of an inch thick, cracked right off. I ran over to the spot and picked it up. It was a black walnut. Not wishing to break the family nutcracker, I got a large ax and struck it into a stump. Then I got a small hand ax and placing the nut on the other ax, began to crack it. The meat was yellowish and rather greasy. I ran from tree to tree, picking up the nuts and cracking them open to get one that was not greasy; but in vain. Finally I got an idea. I took one of the opened nuts to the camp naturalist.

She Loves Me; She Loves Me Not

Rutherford N. Hatfield sat on the edge of his saggy bed in a dingy boarding-house. In his hand he held an almost unrecognizable object which, on closer inspection, might be seen to be a mutilated daisy. The floor was littered with several petals of the flower and the amount was rapidly increasing. "She loves me; she loves me not!"—

To look at Rutherford N. Hatfield (or, as he was called by the more daring of his companions, Ruthie) one would not think that he was a superstitious person. Yet so it was. Despite his cakeater walks, his patent leather hair, and his sophisticated smile, Ruthie might have been transplanted from the middle ages. In the morning, if he couldn't decide between the red-striped and the green-dotted tie, he glanced out the window. If the first passing car were a Ford, he wore the red-striped one. Ruthie was partial to red stripes anyway. One of his ancestors had been a barber. Then, if he didn't know whether to go to a Cafe or to chance the boarding-house supper, he opened the nearest book. If the first word on the page were an adjective, he went to a Cafe. If it were a noun, he stayed at home. If it were neither, he tried again, for he couldn't think it could be meant for him to go without his supper.

And so the chant went on. "She loves me; she loves me not—How beautiful she is! Golden hair, eyes blue as skies. There, I might make up a poem about her. My words are rhyming already. Eyes as blue skies. The girl of my dreams! She loves me; she loves me not.—Can she love me? I've never done anything more than speak to her. But maybe she can get my thoughts. She loves me; she loves me not. Ah! She loves me!" The last of the petals fell to the floor. Excitedly Ruthie got to his feet. "Now, what'll I do?" He shut his eyes tightly and pulled out his watch. "If it's after six, I'll call her up and ask her to go somewhere. If it's before six, I won't." He looked at his watch. It was five minutes to six. And, a true believer in signs, he spent the evening at home, thinking of her.

She would probably have been very much surprised to see him there. To her he was only a young man she had met once or twice. In the days that followed, she wondered at his persistence in trying to be with her and talk to her.

At last the great day came. Ruthie had decided that it was time to settle things. "Here she is," thought he, "loving me and not knowing how I love her." He therewith picked up a nearby book. "Glory be! An adjective," he shouted gleefully, "That means I'll propose to her today. Fate was with Rutherford N. He met her as he returned from work. Quickly he turned and walked beside her. "There—there is something I've been wanting to say to you for a long time. I guess you've wondered why I didn't before. But—will you marry me?"

She looked at him in bewilderment. "Why, I don't even believe I know your name. Besides, didn't you know? I'm engaged to Jimmy Biggers. We're to be married next month".

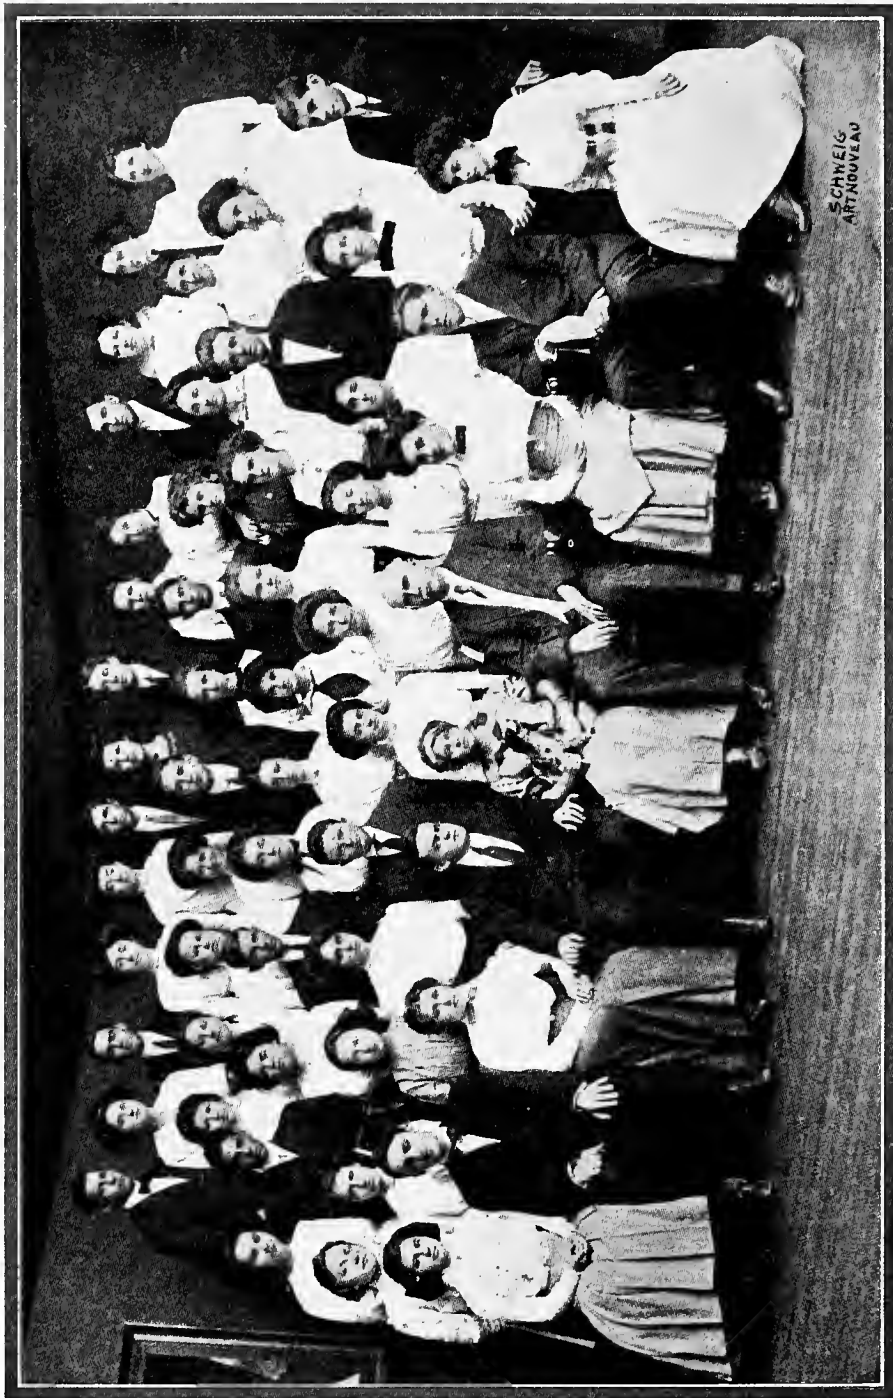

Ruthie was squelched. Sadly he waited for the homeward bound street car. He ascended the steps with the air of a martyr. Weren't women queer? He slowly took a seat. Then he looked around. Ah! He pulled himself up and looked again. Yes, beside him sat an engaging piece of humanity in a huge fur coat. He had a vision of black curls under a red hat. She was smiling at him. She smiled again, slowly, enchantingly. Then the conductor's voice rang out, "Middleboro Avenyoo," and she was gone. Ruthie was tempted to follow but first looked up at the advertisement above his head. It was not, as he had hoped, and advertisement of "Keep that Schoolgirl Complexion" soap, so he sat in the car the rest of the way, thinking of her. Sparkling brown eyes, hair black as the raven's wing. The girl of his dreams.

That night, on the edge of his saggy bed in a dingy boarding-house, sat Rutherford N. Hatfield. In his hand he held a mutilated daisy and in a monstrous undertone he muttered "She loves me; she loves me not."—

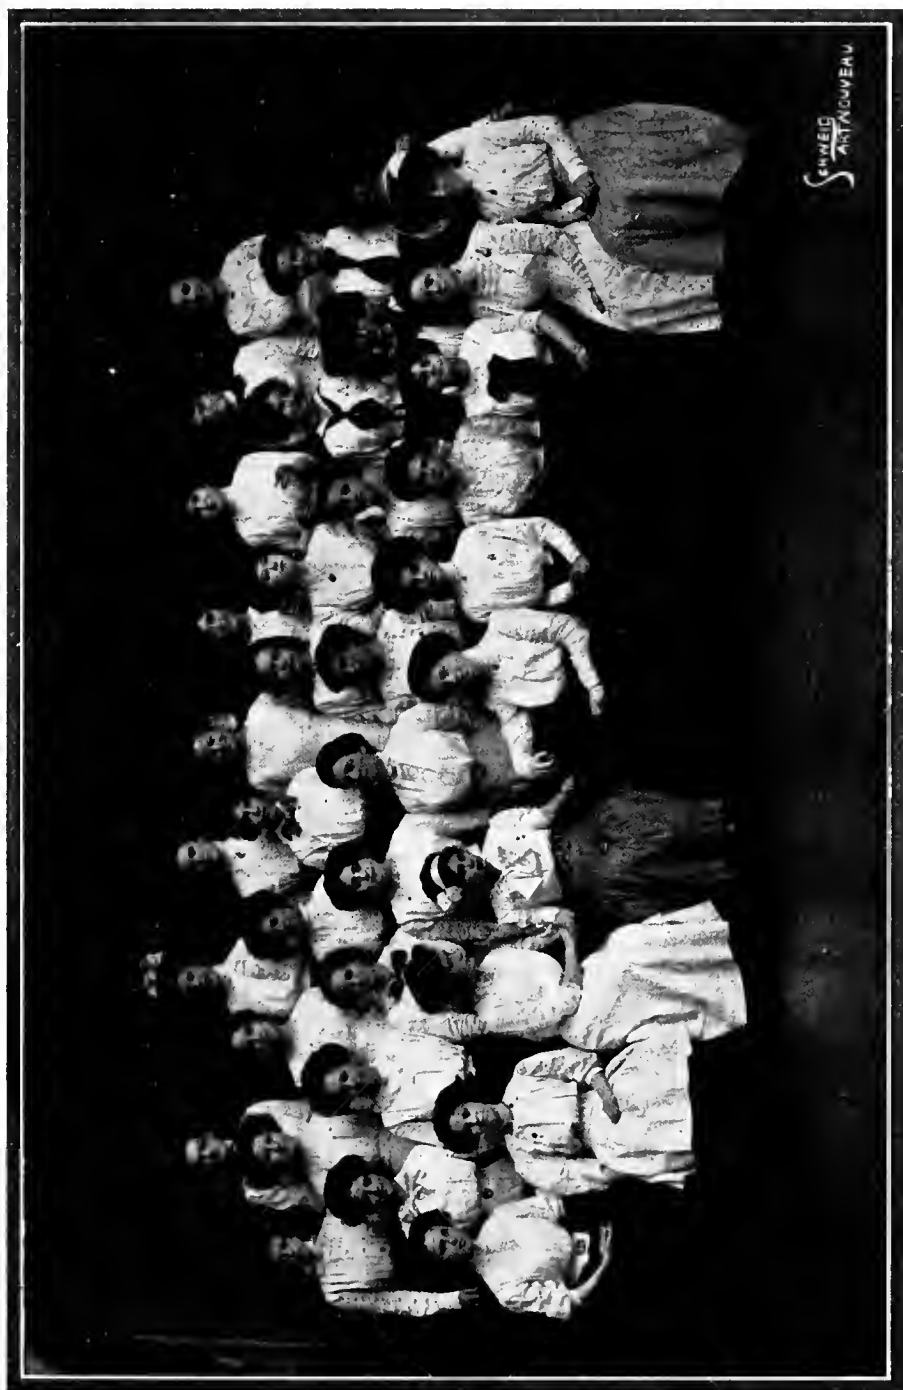

May Holmes

How roughly he was treating her. He was pulling her teeth out one by one. Oh, such painful torture. She felt dizzy, as though she were going up and down through the storm tossed waves of an angry sea. Now he was dragging her through an endless mass of tangled brush. Still she bravely held her ground. But little by little he bent her proud spirit. At least she could stand it no longer and broke under the strain. For you see, she was only a comb struggling through a musician's heavy head of hair.

Soldan Songs

Serious and Non-Serious

Soldan, Alma Mater

"Conquer, Soldan, conquer,"
Faithful voices shout,
"Sweep aside resistance,
Put the foe to rout."
Loyal hearts inspiring,
Soldan cannot fail;
'Gainst our valiant spirit,
None can e'er prevail.

Chorus

Soldan, cheer for Soldan,
Alma Mater, loud and clear;
Strong and steady,
Every ready
In the fight for victory.
Soldan, cheer for Soldan,
For we're sure to win renown;
So we'll raise our voice to Soldan,
For the Pride of the Gold and Brown.

Conquer, Soldan, conquer,
Triumph over all,
As the sons of Soldan
Hasten to your call;
Naught can stay our progress,
Onward moves the throng;
Pledge we faith to Soldan,
Both in deed and song.

Chorus

Soldan, here's to Soldan,
May her name be always bright;
Conquer ever,
Falter never,
In her struggle for the right.
Soldan, dreams of Soldan,
When we've drifted far apart,
And in life as in our school days
Hold her motto in our heart.

Easy Enough

It is easy enough to be pleasant
When Fate's on your side of the deal;
But the guy worth while
Is the guy who can smile
When a new shoe is rubbing his heel.

We've Just Arrived

We've just arrived for the big game,
To roll up a great big score;
We're going to make old (Roosevelt) tame,
So they can't play the game any more.

We'll run that score so big and high,
That it will make them cry;
Boo-hoo, Boo-hoo, Boo-hoo, Boo-hoo,
As they bid the game good-bye.

Soldan, Soldan High,
You're the best school in the world,
And when we beat up poor old (Roosevelt)
Then our flag will be unfurled.

Soldan, Soldan High,
Sing her praises to the sky,
Always fight for dear old Soldan,
Soldan High.

For the Glory of Soldan High

See our foot ball team in battle line,
Greet them with a rah! rah! rah!
Every one a fighter brave and fine,
They are Soldan's boys that's why.
Cheer their valiant spirit all the time.
Give another hurrah! rah! rah!
Put the enemy's feet in a rapid retreat
For the glory of Soldan High.

See the winners wave the Brown and Gold,
Flag of Soldan—rah! rah! rah!
It's the emblem of the Brown and Gold,
Our bright flag that floats on high.
Sign of Victory and power untold!
It's our banner—hurrah! rah! rah!
They uphold it with might
And like heroes they fight
For the glory of Soldan High.

A Bow Legged Man

A bow-legged man was heard to say,
Was heard to say,
"Come, ladies; come, ladies;
Come, ladies; just walk this way."

What Are You Going to Do?

What are you going to do to help old
Soldan;
What are you going to do to help the team?
Every winning of a game
Will add to Soldan's fame:
The least that you can do
Is buy a season ticket or two.
Are you going to be a stingy old slacker,
The kind that only makes a lot of steam?
Then you are really worse than the other team's backer;
So what are you going to do to help the team?

The Baby Elephant

The baby elephant is sad,
His life is dull and gray;
The baby elephant is sad,
His life is dull and gray.
He cannot suck his thumb,
He cannot suck his thumb,
Because, because his nose is in the way.

Watch Your Step

The absent-minded New Jay
Is with us once again
He's here in all his glory,
And awkward, sure, as sin.

He brightens up the classroom
As soon as he comes in
And tries with tireless energy
His teacher's love to win.

We laugh when he makes errors,
Though we, perhaps, erred, too;
He'll learn by observation,
And he'll observe of you.

So watch your step, new Seven,
And somber Senior, too;
The way the New Jay acts this term
Depends a lot on you.

How to Pass Exams

Never study when you feel well,
Or have something else to do;
Never study when you are happy,
Or that will make you blue;
Never study in the daytime,
Or study in the night;
But work and study at all times
With all your main and might.

Fellow Named Green

There was a young fellow named Green
Who became alarmingly lean,
Got so flat and compressed
That his back touched his chest,
And sideways he could not be seen.

The Donkey and the Zebra

When the donkey saw the zebra
He began to switch his tail.
"Well, I never!" was his comment,
"There's a mule that's been in jail!"

They Keep on Coming

They keep on coming,
Those trusty, green New Jays;
They keep on coming,
From all around our ways.
Younger they are coming,
Younger every year;
They keep on coming,
The green won't disappear.
To work and not to play;
Scholarships their day dreams rule.
We see them from afar,
As they ride a kiddie car,
But still keep on coming to school.

Just Smile

The thing that goes the farthest
Towards making life worth while,
That costs the least and does the most,
Is just a pleasant smile.
A smile comes mighty easy;
You can wrinkle up with cheer
Before you can so much as squeeze
A dry and soggy tear.

So, smile away, good people,
And a real smile is what's meant;
It's worth a million dollars
And it doesn't cost a cent.
It's worth a million dollars,
But it doesn't cost a cent;
So, smile away, good people,

A Hundred Years Ago

A hundred years ago today
A wilderness was here;
A man with powder in his gun
Went forth to hunt a deer:
But now the times have changed somewhat
Along a different plan;
A deer with powder on her nose
Goes forth to hunt a man!

You Can Always Tell the Irish

You can always tell the Irish,
You can always tell the Dutch;
You can always tell the Irish,
You can always tell the Dutch.
You can always tell a senior
When he wants to make a touch;
You can always tell a senior,
But you cannot tell him much.

We'll Pull for Old Soldan

We'll pull for old Soldan,
—Soldan High
The girls are the prettiest,
The fellows the wittiest,
Of any school we know.
We'll pull for old Soldan,
The place where the best people go.
We'll fight—we'll work—
We'll all pull together,
For S-O-L-D-A-N High.

All the foregoing Songs were composed by William John Hall

I'd Like to Be a Senior

I'd like to be a senior,
And with the seniors stand,
With a fountain pen behind my ear
And a note book in my hand.
I wouldn't be an emperor,
I wouldn't be a king;
I'd rather be a senior
And never do a thing.

Any Little Mark

Any little mark that's a good little mark
Is the right little mark for me.
It doesn't have to be an "E" or "G"
If an "F" plus it will be.
It doesn't have to bring me a scholarship
To Yale or old Pennsy;
Any little mark that's a good little mark
Is the right little mark for me.

Canning and Preserving

A canner exceedingly canny
One morning remarked to his granny,
"A canner can can anything that he can,
But a canner can't can a can, can he?"

The above three Songs copyright by Theodore Presser Co., 1929.

The music to all the preceding Songs was written by William John Hall.

The Gold and Brown

Our bright emblem of loyalty
Drives away all adversity.
Steady and true
We'll be to you,
Loyal sons of Soldan High.
(Spoken) Rah—Rah—Rah
Raise on high our banner bold,
Colors of Brown and Gold,
(Spoken) OH! GOLD-AND-BROWN!
Pride of the Town. Hurrah! for Soldan High.

(Repeat)

As the Backs Go Tearing By

As the backs go tearing by,
On their way to do or die,
Many sighs and many tears
Mingle with old (Beaumont's) cheers,
As the backs go tearing by;

March, March on Down the Field

March, march on down the field,
Fighting for Soldan.
Break through the (Cleveland) line,
Their strength to defy.
We'll give a long cheer for Gold and Brown
We're here to win renown.
(Cleveland's) team may fight to the end,
But we will win.
Rah! Rah! Rah! (Repeat)

Making gain on steady gain,
Echo swells the sweet refrain.
Soldan's going to win today,
Soldan sure must win today,
As the backs go tearing by.

Yours truly

Alumni Directory

ALL Graduates of the School, from the Class of January, 1911, to the Class of January, 1929, including those graduating in Summer School from time to time, have been listed for this Directory. In attempting to publish in one continuous list the names of all the Graduates of the School, Scrip has undertaken a stupendous task. There may be many errors,—errors of omission, incorrect spelling of names, as well as incorrect information. We ask the Graduates to be tolerant and helpful by sending in corrections for future editions. The list includes over 5000 names, and it would not be reasonable to expect completeness and perfection. Scrip is indebted to Miss Marguerite Mott, Miss Joanna Hoolan, Mr. P. L. Stavseth, and Miss Esther Blitz, and to the several Sponsors of the various classes, to whom appreciation and acknowledgment are here expressed.

Class Song—June 1929

O school of many happy days!
We raise our song to you in praise;
We've tried to serve you loyally,
You have repaid us royally;
You've aided, given us our due,
You have imparted knowledge, too.
Through ever changing years and new
Will oft recur dear thoughts of you.

Refrain

Alma Mater, tried and true,
Soldan, we have pride in you.
May we cherish thy renown
And guard thy colors, Gold and Brown.
"Gnothi seauton", what means this Greek?

If higher knowledge you would seek,
"Know thyself", and ever strive
That you to greatness may arrive.
Your knowledge gleaned should be your start

As on life's stage you take your part,
Make Courtesy a higher art,
Keep Truth and Honor in your heart.

Refrain

Alma Mater, tried and true,
Soldan, we have pride in you.
May we cherish thy renown
And guard thy colors, Gold and Brown.

"Yes, but I must kill you," insisted the infatuated youth.

"But, Robert," she sobbed.

"Didn't I, I myself, see you in his arms?" he persisted angrily.

"Oh, but you don't understand," she wailed.

"After I kill you I shall find him and get my revenge," he vowed.

"Just let me explain, Bob, dear," she murmured meekly.

"Don't call me 'dear,' but prepare for death! Your perfidy must not fool other men."

"Perfidy! Perfidy! Do you call kissing my own brother perfidy?" she ejaculated.

"Your brother? I didn't know that you had a brother!"

"Yes, Bob, and he was leaving for India. There's no crime in kissing a brother good-bye?"

"No dear, forgive me," he murmured. "I knew you were faithful!"

"What do you think of it?" was the hopeful query of the aspiring author.

"Crude," was the deliberate reply of the harsh editor.

The Magic Globe

The globe whirled around. It became a misty purple. The atoms separated and gathered into groups. I saw a traveler at a table. He sat in a dazzling cafe.

The garcon brought him a little water and glass of wine. He took the water and poured it on the floor gaily. He drank the wine.

The picture vanished.

A yellow mist clouded the globe. The atoms scattered. A man, wild and disheveled, burning with fever, gasped for a drink of water. An old woman standing near him shook her head.

"There is none left."

Saved!

The day had started wrong for me,
As I slowly entered that room,
And just because I hadn't done my work
I knew that I was going to meet my doom.

The teacher anxiously began,
Producing that little black book,
But as she hunted for her red pencil
I gave her a most merciless look.
She started with the first problem,
As she called up and down the row,
Although the lesson was moving pretty fast,

That clock was going plenty slow.
Gee! I sure was trembling
And I didn't know what to do,
When she reached the seat ahead of me.
"Gosh!" I thought, "Here comes my Waterloo!"

She called my name out loudly,
As I stuttered and stammered, "Er-
Er-Well—"

—But may heaven pour all blessings
On the man who invented that bell.

Why Worms Wiggle

by

Professor William Waterman Wigglesworth, Ph. D., B. S.

Readers please note:—This is an exact quotation of the lecture as given by Prof. William Waterman Wigglesworth.

Young Ladies, Gentlemen and Students: The great men of this age and the ages before us have puzzled their heads about the many strange things of their time, and have discovered many things, both to the advantage and disadvantage of the coming generation, but has one of them, yes, anyone of them, ever thought or puzzled himself about this valuable motion, the wiggle of a worm? Sit up Delevan, this is a lecture hall, not a lounging room. They have spent their time and money on machinery and man-made inventions but have they given a thought to the work of nature? What's that Lawson? You don't see what good you'll get out of this lecture? Well then, you may give the class your opinion of why worms wiggle. What's that? You have no idea? Well, I might have known as much! Yes—it makes me wonder how such a valuable thing as a wiggle could have been overlooked for so long. What is the matter with you Miss Reel? Must you wiggle and wriggle in your seat like the very worms I am talking about? Aren't you taking notes on this lecture? What's that? You don't see any sense to it? Well, listen to me, young lady, you open your note book and take notes on this lecture or I'll expel you from my lecture hall altogether. As I was saying—Miss Miller—but then—what's the use? I'm sorry you are not interested. I shall not go on. You may use the rest of the hour for study. I should have guessed that this class would not be broadminded enough to listen—the worms may wiggle from now on—you have killed my ambition.

H'all the Way from Canada

The train speeding away from Canada bore among its numerous passengers a gentleman of much wealth and prestige. The gentleman was none other than Mr. John Stewart Thompson. Mr. Thompson upon his arrival in the new country had taken up his abode in Canada, that being the only place on the continent under British rule. He was a Scotchman with all the true characteristics.

He was on his way to visit his only sister in St. Louis. The porter had relieved him of his baggage (a traveling bag to be exact) except a mysterious looking bundle which he had refused to intrust to even so trust-worthy a person as the dusky, old porter. He opened it a little from time to time, raised his hand to his mouth and could be seen energetically working his jaws. The nearer he drew to his destination the more energetic became the movement.

At last he arrived safely at the Union Station still protecting the bundle. His strange accent and solicitousness of the bundle greatly amused the cab driver.

Upon being deposited at the door of a frame house he stood for a moment viewing the surroundings. He was disturbed by a tap on the arm and greatly alarmed at the enormous fee of seventy-five cents which the cab-driver demanded. His loud protests brought little Hammy to the front of the house, and after gazing a bit undecidedly spoke in his manliest tone, "Are you Mr. Thompson? Uncle John?"

"Why yes my little man, H'i believe h'i h'am, and do you 'appen to be 'Amiton? Yes? Then 'ere 'Amy H'i fetched them h'all the way from Canada," and strode to the house.

Hammy eagerly tore off the wrappings and there emitted a gasp of amazement for there before him on a paper plate lay four, hard, dry biscuits.

Signs of Spring

John Jones was totally unconscious of the presence of Spring. Neither the nocturnal debut of the cats on the back porch, nor the crying of the neighbors spoiled baby, not even the early arrival of the milk-man had affected him.

Mr. Jones left for his office, saw the boys playing marbles, saw the girls jumping rope, saw the nurse-maids pushing baby carriages; still he was unaware of the immediacy of Spring.

He read the paper. Weather: fair and warmer for tomorrow. He read the tourist trip advertisements, the cleaners and dyers ads, the spring training baseball reports, and even some poor spring poetry; still he was unconscious of the proximity of the vernal season.

The stenographer was on time, the accountant said good morning, the office boy tipped his cap, and the bank accounts were balanced. But Mr. Jones was unaware of the advent of Spring.

The postman brought the mail and deposited it in a neat stack. Even this most unusual occurrence signified nothing to Jones.

He opened the first envelope. An installment on his wife's fur coat; the second, the ashman's bill; and the third, the winter coal bill.

The sun rose in Japan. An Englishman understood a joke, a Scotchman gave a beggar a quarter, and Mr. Jones comprehended. In his fervent desire to diffuse the light, he interrupted his stenographer who was assiduously powdering her nose.

"Miss Winters, do you realize that Spring, most glorious Spring is upon us?"

For more than 70 years — the best of beverages

I am a member of the school board and yet I am heart and soul for the girls of Soldan High.

I am staunchly in favor of the blue-clad daughters of the St. Louis public, who labor day in and day out in class, with brains so racked and so tired that they would be unequal to the fineness needed to play one exciting game of solitaire.

Nothing fills my heart with so much pleasure as to watch the blue-serged girls going actively from class to class in the corridors.

First, last, and all the time I am for the Soldan girls.

I am one of the country's largest manufacturers of blue-serge uniforms.

Child Like

While a little girl was riding on the street car with her mother she asked, "Mother will I get any more valentines?"

"No," was the fond mother's answer.

"Well, mother, what do I get next?"

"Well, dear, I guess the next will be Easter and that's when the bunny comes."

The street car stopped about that time and the child exclaimed in a shrill child-like voice, "Oh, Mother, I don't believe the bunny will leave me any eggs for there is too much dust in the corners and under my bed."

The fond mother seemed to be very embarrassed amid the loud laughs of the rest of the passengers.

Little Tommy, aged three, had a little sister three months old. One day Tommy's mother found him at the bread box picking crumbs out of a small piece of bread.

"Tommy" said his mother, "don't you know that you should never do that? If baby sister should see you she'd be sure to want some and you know babies can't eat bread."

Tommy put the bread away and a few moments later saw his mother nibbling on a cookie.

"Mother," said Tommy, "aren't you afraid that baby sister might want some cookie too?"

The Prodigal Returns

Goodness, will I never get home!
Heaven help the sailors on a night like this. It's a wonder they wouldn't furnish decent lights in this city. Oh! there goes a black cat across my path. Talk about luck.

Ding! Ding! Ding! Three o'clock in the morning and far from home. Gee! what will the folks say if they find out about this. Perhaps I can slip in through the basement window. Ah! at last I'm home.
The window is open. What a break. For crying out loud, I've knocked something over. Here the folks come. I'll just hide behind this old trunk. Now they're talking in muffled tones. I do believe they think I'm a burglar. What a joke.

Goodness! they've seen me.

"Spots, you bum, what do you mean by coming in at this hour," piped up Bud.
Oh! Oh! will they never stop whipping me? Why can't they let a poor dog alone?

Stung

"Be careful, you'll get stung if you don't hold your torch higher!"

Dan Graham was attempting, for the first time in his life, to rob the bees without any assistance from his father. He had often watched his father take the honey from the score of hives which stood in the gay flower garden.

Dan had led a lonely life on his father's huge Texas plantation and so he had looked to the bees for companionship. He loved to watch them as they hurried to and fro among the plants, gathering the delicious nectar with which they made their honey. He eagerly looked forward to the time when he could take care of them himself.

Now Dan was realizing one of his long cherished dreams. He was cutting out the rich honey that his bees had made. Slowly and carefully he was driving the bees to the bottom of the hive with his torch. Quickly he cut out the wax combs full of honey. There was practically no danger as the hive happened to belong to the older bees. They were used to the process and wouldn't sting as readily as the younger ones. He had just finished taking the last sticky mass from the hive when an excited and flustered man rode up. Dan immediately recognized him as Colonel Hawkins, their nearest neighbor.

"Have you heard that the notorious outlaw band from across the border is near here," he gasped. "They have been ravishing the countryside and have learned somehow that you have the company's payroll. Any way they are about ten miles away and they are coming straight this way. Sorry I can't do anything but I must be off," and he was gone like a streak of lightning.

"Thank you for warning us," shouted Mr. Graham after the fast retreating figure. He then went inside to get his guns, and also to allay his wife's fears. Dan remained outside to pour corn meal in the hives so that the bees might have material to build new combs for their queen. He went about his work mechanically for his thoughts were busy with the outlaws.

In that home, usually so peaceful and calm, all was dismay. Doors and windows were barricaded as they had seen a cloud of dust on the long, level road; they realized now that horseman were fast approaching.

Just then Dan unlocked the door and rushed out. Hurling all the bee hives from their stands he was dragged back by his frantic mother just as the terrible riders swept in through the gate and came swooping over the flower garden.

Then up rose the bees in a fury, to avenge their ruined homes, and to fight, little as they knew it, for the masters who cared for them. Fiercely the conflict raged. What cared the bees for pistol-shot? In hundreds and thousands they clung to the maddened horses. They swarmed around the outlaw's heads, and crawled, and stung, and died.

After twenty minutes Dan put his head out of the window and saw a cloud of dust. The baffled bandits were fleeing from the battlefield where the bees had fought them and won.

Too Bad

Two faces met, the man's was grim and tense; the other was small and white. Two slender hands pressed against it. The man stared at those frail hands with a horrified gaze.

The stare was tragic, hopeless! The other face was the face of his watch and it told him he had worked five minutes overtime.
